There is said to be much uneasiness in French society at the present day, arising from different causes; but that source of discontent which appears most on the surface is the defiance with which the Government is treated by the bishops. In spite of the Imperial commands, it is now understood that these functionaries are determined to proceed to Rome, to assist in what the Pope calls the canonization of the Japanese martyrs, but which is shrewdly suspected to be a blind for a consultation on the means of asserting the temporal power of the Pope. But the strangest of all episcopal acts is that of the Archbishop of Toulouse, who gravely proposed to his flock, in a pastoral letter, that they should hold a festival on the tercentenary anniversary of a foul massacre of the Huguenots, who had laid down their arms in reliance on the solemnly-sworn promise of protection by the Roman Catholics. All Paris was crying shame upon it, and the Government were compelled peremptorily to interfere and prohibit the scandal. In our correspondent's letter will be found some judicious remarks on this strange outburst of fanaticism, together with mention of one interesting fact, that as soon as the Archbishop's letter was made public, all the respectable Roman Catholics of the city, all the Imperial and municipal functionaries, hastened to the Protestants, to assure them of the abhorrence and indignation with which they witnessed this attempt to revive what they would prefer to have buried in utter oblivion.

We have had occasion, in previous months, to congratulate our readers on the prospect that was opening in Austria for the freedom of Protestant worship and education. As yet, however, the plans submitted for the emancipation of the Churches remain projects only; they have not yet been passed into law; and the grievance under which Protestants labour in that country remain unredressed. But God does not stay His hand for man's slackness; and we are glad to chronicle the circumstance that a great spiritual awakening has taken place in Bohemia. In that early cradle of the Reformation, where Protestantism made such early and rapid progress, till it was crushed under the joint oppression of the soldier and the Jesuit, the seeds of Gospel light, once sown broadcast over the soil, still lie dormant there, and need but the first faint awakenings of sunshine to germinate and blossom on every side. Hence it is with little surprise, though with much gladness, we read of whole villages throwing off the Romish yoke, and declaring themselves to be Protestants. This is the case, even though the prohibition against schools and against burial in the local cemeteries still continues; we may judge, therefore, what will be the effect when the Concordat is abolished and perfect liberty is allowed to religious opinion.

We regret we are not able to report any improvement in the condition of our persecuted Spanish brother, Matamoros, and his companions. Notwithstanding the promises of O'Donnell to the deputation that waited upon him, these persecuted men are still undergoing the penalty for their fidelity to conscience and to God's Word. There is no present hope of their punishment being mitigated. But our trust is that a higher than earthly power will interpose on their behalf. At the request of the Evangelical Alliance, simultaneous prayer was offered for these confessors in most of the gatherings for prayer that were held on Monday, the 21st ult.

The letter of our correspondent in Holland will be perused with melancholy interest. Of all the Churches of the Reformation, Holland has perhaps always stood the lowest in point of Evangelical fervour and purity; and she shared in her full measure that withering, benumbing influence of neology which about the beginning of the present century spread over the Continental Churches. From this condition she appears to be the last to emerge. At the same time, it is satisfactory to find that there is still sap in what might otherwise appear to be a lifeless trunk; and that here and there the people resist and protest against the semi-infidel teaching of the clergy. Outside the Establishment we believe there is considerable spiritual life; though there, too, as in the rest of the Continent, it is only the old forms of dissent that are tolerated; new forms are looked upon with as much suspicion as new and unauthorised religions were in pagan Rome. We cannot but hope, however, that brighter days are yet in store for the Dutch Church. When we remember the refuge she afford to our own martyrs and confessors at a time when evil days had befallen us, we must ever feel grateful, and endeavour to repay with interest the benefit we once derived from her.

The news from Syria is very cheering this month. The patient and unwearied labours of the missionaries there at length appear to be on the point of being crowned with success. Never before, they say, was there so much inquiry on the subject of religion; never before was there a year that promised to be so fruitful in the history of Syrian evangelization. It is interesting, too, to note the causes that, under God, have led to this state of thing. The massacres, it seems, have done it all. Those horrible scenes of rapine and blood, that made the ears of all who heard of them to tingle, have been overruled in a way to break up old-rooted prejudices, to awaken a spirit of inquiry, and to dispose the native mind for the reception of the Gospel. When the remnants of the Maronites were driven from their mountain homes, and forced to seek shelter in the large cities and on the sea coast, they were brought into association with modes of life which shook many of their secluded and preconceived ideas; and the experience of English charity and English sympathy, extended to them so largely and disinterestedly, naturally led them to the conclusion that the religion of such a people could not be far wrong. Hence the interest that is now taken in the preaching of the Gospel; hence the demand that has sprung up, on every side, for copies of the Word of God; hence, as at Homs, the formation of Christian communities in places from whence the presence and influence of a Christian missionary had been for some time withdrawn, and where all his labours appeared at the moment to be fruitless. But the Word of the Lord never returns to Him void.

The news from China this month is of considerable interest. The last lingering hope of good that might result from the movements of the Taeping insurgents has vanished since Mr. Roberts, the missionary who was for a time so favoured by the insurgent chief, published his letter setting forth the barbarous treatment he had experienced, and how he had been forced to flee for his life; and we suppose there is no one now in this country or in America that expects those setters-up of a new creed to pave the way for the introduction of a purer Gospel. Their threatened descent upon the towns on the coast where the European settlements are is therefore matter of much interest. If it were not for the resolution of the European Governments to protect those towns for the sake of their own subjects settled there, and of the trade of which they are the emporiums, we might look for every missionary being driven out, and the complete suppression of Christian teaching throughout the whole of that vast continent. Fortunately, that is not now likely to happen; and we can only trust that God will overrule the throes under which that empire now labours to the furtherance of His own purposes. It is interesting to notice, from the letter of our correspondent, that the week of prayer was observed there, as well as elsewhere; and in the face of the persecutions, and even martyrdom, to which some of the native brethren were exposed, the meetings must have been characterised by special earnestness and solemnity.

THEOLOGY OF THE REFORMATION: THE DOCTRINE OF ASSURANCE.*

Good service might be rendered to the cause of religion and literature by a thoroughly learned, impartial, and unsectarian treatise upon the theology of the Reformers, and the actual standing of that theology, as to its main articles, in our day. It does not seem to us that the late able and lamented Principal Cunningham would, under any circumstances, have been peculiarly qualified for such a work as we desiderate. And, at all events, the volume before us labours under the double disadvantage of having been originally written for periodical purposes of different kinds, and of now being posthumously edited and published. Owing to the former cause it is, to some extent, polemical and personal also; and now—when the grave has closed over the writer, as well as over many of those with whom he engaged in temporary combat—the effect is harsh and inharmonious often. We want to hear the music of heaven, the charming issues of Divine philosophy, the harmonised utterances of the oracles of God; and we meet, instead, too frequently, the clang of earthly armour and the din of human conflict. Pity it is that such should be too generally the case. Often do we ask ourselves, Is it not possible, in the demesne of religion, to be comprehensive, generous, candid, forbearing; and yet zealous, decided, uncompromising, and true? To be liberal, yet not latitudinarian in an evil sense? To allow for the prepossessions of others and suspect our own, while we quietly endeavour to evolve truth only? The vast importance of the subject, as well as the infirmity of human nature, too often infect theological discussion with a spirit which has been its standing reproach, and which, on first thoughts, one might suppose theological discussion ought to be especially less liable to than any other. Without personal reference, accordingly, to any living or very recent writers, we would desire to see the theology of the Reformation candidly and comprehensively surveyed, and compared anew with the one standard of truth, in the light of modern criticism (if we indeed have much additional true light of that kind), and in the spirit of modern mutual respect and forbearance, which we do confidently believe has vastly increased among cultivated minds. The volume before us, while—owing to its structure, to which we have alluded—it is inherently and necessarily defective, is yet very suggestive, both as to what ought to be avoided, and as to what might usefully be essayed. We can only at present touch upon one topic, as illustrative of what might tend to general edification, if it were judiciously discussed. We are not acquainted with any thoroughly good treatise upon the doctrine of assurance; and one of the essays of Dr. Cunningham upon that doctrine, and on its connexion with, and distinction from, saving faith, and the views of the Reformers in relation thereto, leaves a very perplexed and unsatisfactory impression upon the mind.

* The Reformers and the Theology of the Reformation. By the late WILLIAM CUNNINGHAM, D.D., Principal and Professor of Church History, New College, Edinburgh. Edited by his Literary Executors. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark, 38, George-street. London: Hamilton, Adams and Co. Dublin: John Robertson. 1862.

What is assurance? Is it a mere frame or feeling? Or is it a sound logical deduction from uncontested premises? Or is it a combination of both of these? Or something distinguishable from both, or either?

According to Sir William Hamilton, whom Dr. Cunningham criticises and confutes, assurance was universally held by all the Protestant early Churches as a criterion and condition of true saving faith; it was a doctrine condemned by the Council of Trent; and it is now almost universally given up by Protestants. This view of the case is analysed and exposed by Dr. Cunningham, who throws some light upon the historical and controversial aspect of the question, but does not seem to us to afford any scientific explanation of the true character of the doctrine itself.

To us it appears far from an easy task to draw a distinct separation between true saving faith and assurance, either speculatively or practically, though it is often attempted verbally. A believer, in the Evangelical sense of the term, is one who trusts, who relies, who has confidence in Christ, or in God through Christ. This trust, or reliance, or confidence, regards the character, and promises, and truth of God, upon the one hand; and the salvation of the believer on the other. TO BELIEVE IS TO BE SAVED. If I can know that I believe, how can it be said I cannot know that I am saved? If I do know that I believe, and know that God cannot lie, and therefore know that I am saved, what is this but legitimate assurance? On the other hand, if I have not this assurance, if I do not know that I am saved, how do I know, or how can I say with truth, that I do indeed believe? What is it that I do believe? Of what use, power, or value, is that so-called faith, which does not give me a personal interest in the work of Christ, the promises of the Gospel, and, in one word, Salvation? It is easy enough, indeed, to baptise people wholesale and call them Christians, or believers; and as the Church of Rome proceeds on that wise, it is logical for her to deny the doctrine of assurance as predicable of merely such "faithful" professors. But no less competent are we to deny the propriety of predicating of such, not assurance only, but faith also, in its Evangelical sense. Faith without work is dead; that is to say, it is no faith at all. In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but faith which worketh by love. And this faith is personal necessarily; nor is its existence very conceivable apart from some degree of assurance, which degree of assurance will be the very measure of the power of the faith.

If, indeed, it were said that assurance does not exist in degree, but is only a strong, clear, high degree of faith, or of hope, or of knowledge, which some favoured individuals attain, that would be (at least apparently) a distinction which might be practically used (as it has been sometimes) to abate presumption, or prevent despair, or stimulate to progress. But, after all, it is doubtful if this be a true statement according to Scripture. And we do not imagine that this was the doctrine of the Reformers. They, as well as the Apostles, appear to have taken it for granted that belief in Jesus involved assurance of salvation, both scientifically and practically. Not that either taught a man to say, "I believe that I am saved, and therefore I am saved;" or, "I believe that Jesus died specifically for me, or that I have a personal interest in Christ, or am an actual object of Divine favour, and therefore I am assured of salvation." But having set before the sinner Jesus—as an all-merciful, and all-sufficient, and perfectly trustworthy Saviour; His blood and righteousness as cleansing from all sin, and justifying from all condemnation, all and every one who put their trust in Him, in His promises, His power, and His grace—they appear to leave unmooted the question of any distinction between saving faith and assurance of salvation. To believe that Jesus is able, and might be willing, to save me, if I trusted Him, is one thing; to trust Him, and to be conscious that I trust Him, is another. It will scarcely be contended that the former of these moods amounts to Evangelical faith. And how the latter of these moods, when genuine, could exist without real assurance, stronger or weaker, we cannot well comprehend. The bride coming up from the wilderness, leaning on the arm of the beloved, trusts in that arm, and feels secure.

Accordingly, when we find theological statements to the effect that "assurance of faith (Heb. x. 22) does not relate to our personal interest in Christ, but consists in a firm belief of the revelation that God has given us of Christ in His Word, with an entire dependence on Him,"* we must suppose the writer rather to mean that assurance of faith does not primarily relate to our personal interest in Christ. In other words, the object and ground of our faith is Christ and His finished work of redemption, and not our personal interest in Him. We believe in Christ unto salvation; we do not believe in our own personal salvation unto salvation. But still, belief in Christ bringing salvation, must bring into the soul assured salvation; or faith and salvation become, indeed, little else but words, "eviscerated" of their meaning and power.

Does a saving faith, then, exist prior to a trustful reliance on the Saviour? We can scarcely think it does. And if not, how is a trustful reliance on the Saviour's truth, power, and love to be separated from a sure hope of personal salvation by Him? Apostles and Reformers seem to us to have decided that the separation is not to be made. But many more modern divines handle the subject differently; treating assurance as a high degree of faith; or as the concomitant of a superior degree of sanctification; a state of grace desirable, attainable, and, indeed, obligatory, on all believers to seek after, but not included in the idea of saving faith. Such seems to be substantially John Newton's view in his sermon on assurance. Such, according to Principal Cunningham, is the clear teaching of the Westminster Confession, and the fundamental principle of the teaching of the Reformed Churches on the subject of assurance. Yet he adds: "We fear it has at all times been too much neglected, both theoretically and practically, viewed both as declaring a truth and enforcing a duty. We believe that the prevailing practical disregard of the privilege and the duty of having assurance, is, to no inconsiderable extent, at once the cause and the effect of the low state of vital religion among us—one main reason why there is so little of real communion with God as our reconciled Father, and so little of real hearty devotedness to His cause and service."

We incline to go a step further still than Dr. Cunningham. We incline to fear that the recognition of that as faith which is not faith, but mere profession, lies at the root of this matter. At all events, to establish the scientific truth on this point of theology could not fail to be productive of good practical results. Whether assurance be a necessary ingredient in a truly saving faith (as we incline to think), or whether it be something distinct and only attainable by a certain process, is a question worthy of calm, non-controversial, earnest inquiry. For though it may be argued that the practical uses of the doctrine are in either case the same, the fact seems to be that the Primitive Christians, the Reformers, and the early Puritans took generally one view, and more modern divines another; while the power of vital religion is conceded to be conspicuous in the former cases, and lamented as having declined in the latter.

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.*

ONE of the means for stirring up a missionary spirit at home approved of by the Missionary Conference that met at Liverpool in 1860 was the establishment of some lectureship on that important subject. The aim of such a project was to reach the more intellectual classes, and disseminate among them correct views of Christian missions. But many serious difficulties appeared in the way, arising, among other causes, from the various denominational dissensions between Christians. Beyond, therefore, the discussion of the point nothing has been done by any corporate body.

But we are much pleased to perceive that something has been done by individual interest in this matter. The subject was taken up last year in the Donnellan Lectures, preached before the University of Dublin by Rev. W. P. Walsh. These lectures are to the University of Dublin what the Bampton Lectures are at Oxford, and the Hulsean Lectures at Cambridge. One of our best works on inspiration originated in this way. We refer, of course, to the work of Dr. Lee. The Donnellan Lectures for 1861, on "Christian Missions," were well fitted to succeed those for 1860, on "Pastoral Duties;" the one delineating the duty of the Church at home in her pastoral character; the other the no less imperative duty which lies upon her to labour for the extension of the kingdom of Christ abroad. Such works as those of Dr. Lee and Bishop O'Brien on doctrinal questions, and of Dr. Atkins and Mr. Walsh on practical points, tend to raise our opinion of the soundness of the Irish school of divinity in these troublous times.

The great warrant for Christian missions is the command of our Saviour. The fate of the heathen ought not to be the rule of our duty. The question for us to consider is not what judgment will be meted out to those who have never heard the Gospel, but rather how we can best bring the Gospel to them. To argue first that the heathen may be saved without the Gospel, and then that it is better to leave them alone in their ignorance of it, lest by their rejection of it they should be involved in a greater responsibility, is passing strange to hear from the lips of Christians; and, were the argument valid, would tend to prove that heathenism, on the whole, is better than Christianity. Why, then, should the Saviour have given the command to go and teach all nations? and why should Paul have endured such perils in his missionary labours? We had better reverse the hymn of gratitude that Dr. Watts puts in the mouth of the "happy English child," and accommodate it for being used by a poor little idolater.

Such arguments, however, are only to be met in the case of those who have made up their minds not to give for mission work, and would fain cloak over their own selfishness and want of faith in the Gospel.

Mr. Walsh's lecture on the missionary germ in the Old Testament, and its expansion in the New, presents many points of interest. The limitation of religion to the Jewish nation was, in God's plan of the education of the world, designed for its ultimate expansion. It kept revealed truth from being utterly lost in the flood of idolatry, ready in God's own time to be brought forth from its hiding-place to shine with greater lustre than ever. Although the Jews, in their narrowness, were hostile to any privileges bestowed on the Gentiles, and this narrow spirit appeared frequently in the Apostles themselves, the Old Testament Scriptures do not countenance such views. The time was even alluded to by successive prophets in terms of rapture when the Gentiles should recover their long-lost rights in their Father's house, when the Messiah should not only be the glory of Israel, but also a light to lighten the Gentiles, to lighten every man who cometh into the world.

It is too often left out of sight that the population of the land occupied by the twelve tribes was by no means exclusively Israelitish. With the Israelites marching up out of Egypt a mixed multitude of all sorts went on to Canaan, who sometimes, as at Kibrothhattaavah, occasioned no little trouble, but who were not excluded from the religious services. Solomon makes mention even of other foreigners worshipping in the Temple, in his prayer at its dedication. Remains, too, of the aboriginal inhabitants of Canaan seem ever to have existed in the land. No doubt they were subject to some restrictions. No foreigner could be chosen king. Ammonites and Moabites were under more serious disabilities, but in this they were united with others who might be of an Israelitish stock. (Deut. xxiii. 2, 3.) But in the main the Gentiles were permitted to share in the worship of the God of Israel as well as the Israelites themselves.

One great difference between the Jewish and Christian dispensations as respects heathens has always appeared to us to be this: The Jewish Church allowed those that were desirous of so doing to come and unite themselves to her. The commission of the Christian Church is to "go and teach," and "compel them to come in." A missionary like Elijah going to the widow woman of Zarephath, or, like Jonah, sent to the people of Nineveh, was an exception in the Jewish Church; while in the Christian Church missionary work is the thermometer whereby to test its real life.

The Jewish nation, as a witness against idolatry, was, in fulfilment of its mission, brought in contact with the great Gentile kingdoms, as Mr. Walsh writes:—

One after another, as the great centres of civilisation rose up to power, the priest nation of the world, with its grand and distinctive treasure of revealed truth, was placed in connexion with them.

Does Egypt become the cradle of arts and sciences? Israel is sent down thither, under circumstances that attract the attention of the court and kingdom, and after a lengthened sojourn, and a miraculous departure, they leave behind them signal judgments against all the gods of Egypt, and memorable testimony to the supremacy of Jehovah.

Does Babylon become "the lady of kingdoms?" Then Judah goes into captivity for seventy years, not only to be cured of her own idolatrous tendencies, but to bear such heroic witness to the true God, amidst the dens of lions and furnaces of fire, that Nebuchadnezzar himself exclaims, "Of a truth it is, that your God is a God of gods and a Lord of kings;" and on the statute-book of his realm records his conviction, that there is no other God that can deliver after this sort.

Do Persia and Media acquire might and majesty? Then Palestine and her people are made familiar to their kings. Artaxerxes has Nehemiah for his cupbearer; Darius has Daniel for his prime minister; and Cyrus himself rebuilds the temple of Jerusalem.

Greece is in the ascendant, for Alexander has subdued the world; but the conqueror must ride to the very gates of Zion, and there be made acquainted with those prophecies which, whilst they foretold his triumph, established the omniscience of the Lord God of Israel; and when Alexander's kingdom is divided, how remarkable is the providence which induces his successors in Egypt to translate the sacred oracles of the Jews into the most widespread language of the earth.

Rome assumes the sceptre of universal empire, and Judea becomes a Roman province. How signal the arrangement that brings Cæsar and Pompey to Jerusalem, and how expressive of the solemn impression left by the Jewish religion upon the heathen, when those generals (like their Grecian predecessor) are found manifesting a deep reverence for the Temple and its ministers! How worthy of our notice, too, that the last great power of the old world should form unconsciously the link between the Judaism of former and the Christianity of later times! It is a decree of Augustus that brings the Jewish virgin to Bethlehem, and it is a mandate from the Roman Governor that consigns Jesus of Nazareth to death.

Of the missions of the early and middle ages we have a most interesting sketch given us in Mr. Walsh's third lecture. In this he touches somewhat on the striking position which the Irish Church occupied as a missionary Church in the fifth and sixth centuries. Canon Wordsworth, speaking of that Church at that era, says it was "the burning and shining light of the Western world. Her candlestick was seen from afar diffusing its rays, like the luminous beacon of some lofty lighthouse, planted on a rock amid the foaming surge of the ocean, and casting its light over the dark sea, to guide the mariner in his course. . . . We must not be ashamed to confess, that with regard to learning, and especially with regard to sacred learning, Ireland was in advance of England at that time. The sons of our nobles and gentry were sent for education thither. Ireland was the University of the West. She was rich in libraries, colleges, and schools; she was famous as now for hospitality; she received those who came to her with affectionate generosity, and provided them with books and instructors; she trained them in sound learning, especially in the Word of God."

We cannot forbear in passing to allude briefly to Columbanus, one of the Irish missionaries, who did for Europe what Columba did for England. He was trained in the monastery of Bangor, in County Down, went forth at the mature age of thirty as a missionary, and died in 615. His labours extended over a considerable part of France, Germany, and Switzerland. His prayer, which sets forth his earliest missionary longings, is a remarkable composition. An extract will show its nature:—

O Lord, give me, I beseech Thee, in the name of Jesus Christ Thy Son, my God. that love which can never cease, that will kindle my lamp, but not extinguish it, that it may burn in me and enlighten others. Do Thou, O Christ, our dearest Saviour, Thyself kindle our lamps, that they may evermore shine in Thy temple, that they may receive unquenchable light from Thee, the unquenchable light that will enlighten our darkness, and lessen by us the darkness of the world.

My Jesus, I pray Thee give Thy light to my lamp, that in its light the most holy place may be revealed to me, in which Thou dwellest as the Eternal Priest, that I may always behold Thee, desire Thee, look upon Thee in love, and long after Thee. It belongs to Thee to show Thyself to us, Thy suppliants, O Saviour, full of love, that we may know Thee, love Thee alone, think of Thee alone, day and night, that Thy love may fill our souls, and that this love, so great, may never more be quenched by the many waters of this earth, as it is written, "Many waters cannot quench love."

It is a very interesting fact, and one worthy of being generally known, that the convent of Erfurth, so renowned as being the monastery in which Luther dwelt, and where he first discovered the sacred Scriptures, was one of the numerous monasteries which were founded by the Irish in Germany. This fact has been noted by Dr. Wattenbach, whose paper has been translated from the German and published in the Ulster Journal of Archaeology for 1859.

Mr. Walsh's lecture on modern missions—Romish and Protestant—gives some insight into the unsatisfactory nature of the former, and the frauds that their missionaries had recourse to, such as the forgery in Madura of a Veda, in order to substantiate their claim to be received as Brahmins of the West, deriving their origin, equally with the Brahmins of India, from the god Brahm. He also sketches very briefly Calvin's unsuccessful attempt to plant a mission in Brazil; the mission to the Laplanders, begun under the patronage of Gustaf Vasa, King of Sweden; the labours among the North American Indians; the Danish missions in India and Greenland; and the missions undertaken by the Moravian Brethren. With respect to the last-named body, Mr. Walsh notes that though "numbering only about 10,000 in Europe, it is calculated that they have already sent out 2,000 agents; that one out of every forty in their community is a missionary to the heathen, and that there are 57,000 in pagan lands who have either been converted by their instrumentality, or are receiving instruction at their hands." "In 1732 their first labourers were at work. The spirit of these Moravian missionaries may be gathered from a conversation which some of them had at Copenhagen with Count Pless: 'How do you intend to get a livelihood?' 'By the labour of our hands and God's blessing,' adding, 'We shall build a house and cultivate land.' 'But there is no wood to build a house with.' 'Then we will dig a hole in the earth and lodge there.' The records of deaths is deeply interesting: 643 in mission service; 9 on missionary journeys; 11 on voyage out; 2 on voyage home; 22 by shipwreck; 12 murdered."

Oliver Cromwell, that far-seeing man, was among the first who in our country contemplated missionary work. He intended to set up a council for the spread of the Protestant religion, in opposition to the Propaganda in Rome. They were to have been supplied with 10,000*l.* a-year for ordinary purposes, and to receive from time to time such extra assistance as they required. This noble design, however, was not carried into effect, doubtless arising from the troublous character of the times.

The oldest missionary society now in existence is the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel; and most of the great missionary societies are not older than the beginning of this century.

We should bear these facts in mind when we endeavour to estimate the amount of success with which missions have been attended. There are abroad on this subject various erroneous ideas. Brilliant and uninterrupted success is what is generally looked for by the supporters of missions, and this produces naturally several evils. When a work is surrounded by difficulties, the interest in that work flags and the cause sometimes languishes for want of aid. The continual demand made for results being shown, is apt to influence the minds of those engaged in the work, and to make them, in some cases, give too high a colouring to the successes actually achieved. Still more so does this operate in the case of those who, though not actually engaged themselves in the work, endeavour to supply the necessary funds for carrying it on. Unconsciously and unintentionally, they are often apt, not indeed to fabricate stories, but to exaggerate successes. The hopes and aspirations of the missionaries are sometimes related as facts, and the labourers in the field are sometimes much grieved at finding very incorrect impressions taken up from their letters.

On turning to the earliest record of missionary labours—the Acts of the Apostles—we do not meet with anything like an appearance of constant success. In one place Paul is received with gladness, from another he is driven away with stones. To-day, in one place, his labours seem to have begun with bright prospects; to-morrow, in that same place, he has to fly from the persecution which has been stirred up against him. In one place he is cheered only by the conversion of some of the common people, in another some of the higher classes receive the Word of God with gladness. And yet in review of his missionary labours he exclaims, “Thanks be unto God, which always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the savour of his knowledge by us in every place” (2 Cor. ii. 14); and again: “Be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.” (1 Cor. xv. 58.)

“It is, moreover,” as Mr. Walsh remarks, “worthy of observation, that the missionary fields which have eventually proved most fruitful were originally the most unpromising. In New Zealand, the Society Islands, and Sierra Leone, which may be regarded as the most flourishing mission stations in the world, the missionaries toiled incessantly for many years before one solitary convert was brought in.”

In proof: the mission to Sierra Leone was begun in 1804. Not till 1816 did any fruit begin to appear, although many missionaries had before that been carried off by the effects of the climate. The Rev. W. A. B. Johnston, speaking of that period, wrote as follows: “I went on speaking, morning and night, and on Sundays three times, but saw no fruits of conversion; on the contrary, I was much discouraged, for when I had done speaking they would come and ask me for clothing.” Yet fruit began to be seen in that very year, and when he died, in 1823, there were 603 communicants and 3,168 scholars in connexion with the mission.

The following sketch of the results of missions we quote from Mr. Walsh:—

Greenland, once colder and more sterile than its own ice and snow, has thawed, and warmed, and fructified beneath the beams of the Sun of Righteousness.

Sierra Leone, which formerly echoed to the din of the war-gong, and the clank of the slave-chain, now echoes to the sound of peaceful industry, and the chime of the church bell.

The Isles of the Pacific, once rank and poisonous with the worst weeds of heathenism, now exhale the fragrance of every Christian grace.

New Zealand, cannibal and idolatrous, has come to sit, like the dispossessed demoniac, at the feet of Jesus, clothed, and in her right mind, and amidst her unhappy wars has displayed an altered character.

And where the victories of the Gospel have been less territorial than in these instances, its power has not been less apparent on the hearts of men.

Thus, Madagascar has yielded both her converts and her martyrs, and presented the noble example of a Christian community remaining faithful when exposed to relentless and bloody persecution, and deprived of all missionary and pastoral superintendence during a period of twenty-five years.

Bengal has given her testimony that amidst the terrors of her fearful mutiny her converts remained loyal to their Sovereign and faithful to their God.

Where once amidst the palmyras of Tinnevely ascended the smoke of the suttee, and the screams of devil-worshippers, there rise to heaven the spires of village churches, and the responses of Christian worshippers.

And far away in the backwoods of America the Indian has laid down his tomahawk and scalping-knife, and taken up the Bible and the Book of Common Prayer.

The kraal of the Hottentot, the tent of the Kurd, and the wigwam of the Red-man, have all borne evidence to the power of the Gospel of Christ.

And these are facts that depend not on the uncorroborated testimony of the missionary. The unbiassed evidence of visitors to heathen lands has established the gratifying truth that the lesson of the missionary has proved to be "the enchanter's wand" [Mr. Darwin's expression on beholding the results of missionary labour in New Zealand], which, in many an instance, has banished the demons of cruelty and idolatry, and raised up in their stead the amenities of religious and domestic life.

Here we close our review of Mr. Walsh's Donnellan Lectures. We have given a necessarily very imperfect view of their nature and character. Very warmly do we recommend the perusal of the work. It does not partake of the scholastic character which usually characterises lectures delivered in university pulpits; but it is thus perhaps more adapted for general use. Among the impediments to the success of missionary work, we could have wished he had named the too general deficiency of trained labourers—of missionaries versed in the literature and language of the people among whom they labour. Of these there are some bright examples, but we need more. Broadly catholic in its spirit, and Evangelical in its tone, we cannot doubt but that this volume on "Christian Missions" will meet with a hearty welcome. The foot-notes abound with interesting information, and the notes at the end provide what is requisite towards a full understanding of the lectures. The type too is clear, and the "getting-up" of the volume is very creditable to the Dublin publisher.

BROTHERLY-KINDNESS AND BLESSEDNESS.—None thrive more than they that grow in the sunshine of God's blessing, and God blesses those most who are most faithful in His work; and the work of love is the work of God. To do good is to be most like Him; and they that are most like Him do best please Him. In subordination to Christ, in whom we are accepted, we must, by His Spirit, be made thus acceptable in ourselves. It is necessary, therefore, to our own safety, and holiness, and consolation, that we look much abroad at the necessity of others, and study our brethren and the Church of God as well as ourselves. "That we look not every man at his own things, but every man also on the things of others." (Phil. ii. 4.)—Baxter.

Missionary Work in India.

THE SCHOOLROOM AND THE PULPIT.*

THE progress of Christianity in India is a subject which demands the attention of all Christians, and especially of British Christians, who have for many years made great exertions for the cause of the Gospel among their Hindoo and Mussulman subjects, and who, from distance and various other causes, have generally incorrect ideas about the present state and prospects of our holy religion in the East. It may, therefore, surprise some of our countrymen to hear that even missionaries themselves are very much divided in opinion as to the best way for propagating the Gospel in India; there being at least three methods, or combinations of methods, the respective advocates of which argue with almost sectarian zeal for the use of some one of them, to the exclusion of the rest.

The three methods insisted upon are as follow: First, schools; secondly, schools and preaching combined; and, thirdly, preaching, schools being not absolutely ignored, but kept entirely subordinate to the public proclamation of the Word of God by the living voice.

The advocates for schools would not, indeed, absolutely exclude preaching, but they are usually so sure that the Gospel in India must be imparted to the young, as the only hope for the ultimate conversion of the people, that they seldom trouble themselves to learn the native languages, and feel that they are doing their duty best by transforming themselves from preachers of the Gospel into schoolmasters. They are not indeed willing to admit the justice of this charge, for they endeavour to confound teaching with preaching, and say that they are as really preaching the Gospel while teaching it to a class of boys in a schoolroom, as their brethren are preaching it when declaring its blessed truths to a crowd of natives in the bazaar, or under the shade of the trees near a village or a town.

Before proceeding farther, it will be necessary to show that the Bible draws a marked line between preaching and teaching, so that to assert an identity of meaning in the two words is to deny the distinction which God has been pleased to make between them. The most common word used for the promulgation of the Gospel in the New Testament is κηρύσσειν, and the most common substantive is κηρυξ—i.e., "a herald, one who proclaims terms of peace to rebels, and summons them to surrender on those terms, or to take the consequences."

Now every one who presumes to have read the Greek Testament must confess that the word κηρυξ can never be applied to one who teaches a class of boys in a school: for the essential meaning of κηρυξ is, "a herald," "one who proclaims to the public certain terms." It is indeed true that our Lord in His final instructions to His disciples (Matt. xxviii. 19) uses the word μαθητεύσατε—"make disciples;" but it is merely to assume the question to say that our Lord meant them to do so by teaching: in fact, the particular method by which our Lord intended disciples to be made in all the world is decided by His final command, as expressed by St. Mark (xvi. 15), κηρυξάτε—i.e., "go as heralds, and publicly proclaim the terms of salvation;" and in Luke xxiv. 47 our Lord stated His will to be, that "repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations;" the word for "preached" in this passage being κηρυχθηναι—i.e., as before, “heralded,” “publicly proclaimed,” as opposed to private instruction, such as that given by a teacher to boys in a school.

* In giving publicity to this article, from the pen of a missionary in Northern India, we wish it distinctly to be understood that the writer, in this, as in every communication not obviously editorial, is solely responsible for the opinions expressed, and the arguments and language employed. The question is of the highest importance, and, in all such cases, when one side has been argued, we shall afford full opportunity for the presentation of the other.—Eds.

But we may advance a step further, and say that the Holy Spirit has clearly decided about the respective rank of preaching and teaching in the propagation of the Gospel. Thus in 1 Cor. xii. 28 we read: “God hath set some in the Church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers.” Now we know that the office of αποστολοι and προφηται was especially that of addressing the public; and we find them put before and preferred to διδασκαλοι, who are thus distinguished from the former, and placed third in the list. Again, in Ephesians iv. 11 we read: “And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers.” Here again the employment of pastors and teachers, whose business it is to attend to a limited number of people in a certain district, is distinguished from and placed after that of the preachers or heralds of the Gospel of God.

We come next to those missionaries who would employ preachers and teachers equally in the work to which they are called: and indeed the majority of Christians will agree that the whole argument lies between those who would thus put preaching and teaching on a level, and those who would make teaching altogether subordinate to preaching; for few Christians, in England at any rate, will think it worth while to argue with those who assert that our Saviour intended the world to be educated into Christianity by schoolmasters.

We propose, therefore, to show that as our Lord certainly designed His servants to be κηρυκες, so all experience has proved that the public proclamation of the Gospel has, on the whole, been blessed with a degree of success incomparably greater than that given to teaching, and therefore that missionaries ought to be sent and to go forth as κηρυκες of the Gospel in the language of the heathen, while the work of teaching should not be wholly neglected.

We contend, therefore, that the Gospel was established and widely circulated in the days of the Apostles by public proclamation, and not by school teaching. We write for those who know their Bibles, who are familiar with the first missionary report, the Acts of the Apostles: and we appeal to such, whether the Apostles did not show how they understood our Lord's instructions, when He commanded them to “preach the Gospel to every creature.” It is, indeed, said that in Ephesus St. Paul disputed (not taught) in the school of one Tyrannus; but no one would be absurd enough to say that in Ephesus Paul suddenly ceased to be a preacher, and set up as a schoolmaster. “The school,” says Alford, “was probably a synagogue; or Tyrannus may have been a Gentile sophist.” At any rate, men must be hard pushed if compelled to adduce this single passage as a proof that “teaching” is God's method for propagating the Word of Truth.

Again, St. Paul assures the Corinthians (1 Cor. i.) that although the Jews demanded miracles and the Greeks philosophy, God would not use what they considered the proper methods for the Apostles to use, but had rather chosen what the world called foolishness—i.e., the public preaching of the Gospel to confound the a priori reasonings of Jewish rabbis and Greek philosophers. So now, God chooses “the foolishness of preaching” to confound those who cry out that there is not enough of “system” in it, and demand schools and schoolmasters.

It is also certain that the Church of Rome has always set great value on preaching as the means for promulgating her false doctrines. The preaching friars were sent through the world to revive the dying faith of Romanists, and to call in others to the Church of Rome; and the public preaching of God's Word was undoubtedly the great engine in the hands of Luther and the great Reformers in the sixteenth century.

It is no less certain that the revival of religion in some parts of Ireland and Scotland has been brought about by "the foolishness of preaching," and that wherever in England a man who works among the poor in the week and lives a holy life also preaches the Gospel with zeal on Sunday, there a congregation is found pre-eminent among Christians for the faith and hope and love which adorn its members.

Indeed, it is now allowed by common consent, that the best way to inculcate any new ideas is by publicly proclaiming them by the living voice. Thus, that member of Parliament has most influence who is the most fluent, the most energetic, and the most thoughtful speaker; and even the chairman of a Chartist club is chosen for his power of enforcing his views by eloquence, however rude, yet forcible, because coming red hot from the soul.

It has thus been shown that even bad men in the nineteenth century find that the living voice publicly proclaiming their tenets is the most effectual in making proselytes, and that the whole analogy of proselytism is in favour of public proclamation, as distinguished from private teaching; and that the success of Reformers, friars, and the first preachers of Christianity, combined with the distinct command of our Lord, that His Apostles should be heralds, unite in demonstrating the truth of the proposition, that the proper duty of missionaries to the heathen is to proclaim the Gospel from village to village, and from town to town, and to leave the sedentary work of teaching to others.

Now, turning to heathen lands, it is true that a vast majority of the converts is the result of the public preaching of the Gospel. The Orissa missionaries bear witness to this statement, so do those among the Karens; and from an extensive experience, we can assert that in North India the number of converts from the schools is incalculably small as compared with the number of those from preaching. In fact, the great failure of our mission schools has long since been apparent to all who have carefully inquired into the actual state of the case. Thus, the Church Mission School in Calcutta, through which several thousand pupils have passed, produced only two converts in twenty-five years; the Agra College, established ten years ago, and presided over by some of the most learned as well as most earnest missionaries who have ever come to India, has produced only two converts during the whole of that period, while the missionaries who superintended it have baptized more than twenty times that number of converts, as the result of the amount of preaching they were able to perform out of college hours; and we have the testimony of the principals of other large mission schools to the fact that the schools do not produce converts.

It will be worth while to inquire how it is that the continued exertions of the most pious men in these schools have been rewarded by so little apparent success during so long a period; and we believe that when the mere truth is examined into the difficulty will vanish. It must be told, then, to English Christians who have never been to India, that a vast field for employment in Government, railway, telegraph, canal, and other offices, is open to the rising generation in India. The fact is that a native can work for much less pay than a European can manage to subsist upon in India, and the Government and others are anxious to get writers at as low a rate as possible. Hence, throughout India there is among the natives a violent thirst for a European education; and as the fee charged at the mission schools is very low, and the education given is very good, it is obvious that the number of scholars is immense.

The eagerness of the natives to enter the mission schools is quickened by the fact that the course of study in those schools is adapted to the requirements of those who hope to become clerks or writers in offices; and in one case, at least, that of St. John's College, Agra, the Mission College has been affiliated to the Calcutta University. The result is that the natives do not object to send their boys to a school where one hour of the Bible is followed by four or five hours of Euclid, geography, arithmetic, &c. In fact, any fear which the natives might suffer on the score of Christianity is materially diminished in many mission schools by the fact that the missionaries engage the services of Hindoos to teach Christianity, and who, of course, pervert the minds of the boys, and strive to make them laugh at the Bible with all their might. This is a horrible truth, but it is the truth, and it is high time that the subscribers to mission societies should demand of their committees why this awful custom should not at once and for ever be put down.

Schools, however, will always have many advocates in India among gentlemen connected with Government; in fact, the large sums of money subscribed to missions in India is for the most part to be ascribed to the existence of our mission schools for preparing cheap office clerks for the Government. We have frequently conversed with gentlemen who subscribe liberally to missions on the great object of true missionaries, "the conversion of souls to God," and have found them totally uninterested in this most momentous of all questions, although willing to take the chair at a distribution of prizes, and even to found scholarships for the pupils in the mission school.

The sum of the matter is just this, that whether more or fewer converts result from preaching or teaching, is not the question. But the true question is, "What is God's method?" and if we find that preaching, and not teaching, is the method pointed out by God, we are bound to follow it, though not one convert should be made for a thousand years.

On a future occasion, however, we will undertake, by God's blessing, to show that the faithful public proclamation of God's Word cannot fail of success, and therefore that it is most reasonable to employ that method. G.

DEPARTURE OF NUMEROUS FRENCH BISHOPS FOR THE CITY OF ROME.

You remember that our Government had forbidden the Popish bishops to go to Rome for the canonisation of the martyrs of Japan. The note of the Moniteur said expressly that the prelates would not be authorised to undertake this journey, "except for the pressing affairs of their dioceses." This prohibition has not been accepted by the high dignitaries of the Roman Church. Many archbishops and bishops of this country are now in the city of the Vatican. Napoleon III. and his counsellors, seeing that the prelates were firmly resolved to go to Rome, have closed their eyes to their departure. This behaviour is wise. If the depositaries of political authority had resorted to material force to prevent these reverend personages from responding to the call of Pius IX., they would have been accused of persecuting the clergy; and the public opinion of France and Europe would have blamed the Government. But the final issue of this affair will be evil rather than good for the clerical party. You may be assured that the Emperor is deeply irritated at the resistance of the bishops. He has obtained a new proof of this fact—that the priests know but one sole head, one sole master, him that is seated upon the pretended throne of St. Peter. In vain has Napoleon III. heaped upon the episcopal body kindnesses and favours of all sorts; the bishops do not take any account of them, and inflict upon the Imperial will a manifest humiliation as soon as their spiritual lord has spoken.

This is all very well. But it is easy to understand, on the other side, that Napoleon III. will not regard himself as at all bound to go on showing great consideration for the Papal clergy. In fact, the Roman question continues to advance towards a definite solution. The Commander-in-Chief of the French garrison at Rome, M. de Goyon, has been recalled to Paris. His principal fault has been to favour too openly the pretensions of the Pontifical See. The Ultramontane press itself begins to recognise that the bayonets of our army cannot be employed indefinitely in the service of the temporal Papacy. It is a simple question of time. Pius IX. and Cardinal Antonelli have thought that they should gain everything by an inflexible obstinacy. Events will show, on the contrary, that it was the way to lose everything—at least, so far as concerns their temporal interests.

DISCUSSION IN THE SENATE UPON A PETITION FROM THE ARCHBISHOP OF RENNES.

The Senate has recently devoted two long sittings to discussing a petition which had been addressed to it by the Archbishop of Rennes. The municipal council of a village in the province of Brittany had requested a teacher belonging to a monastic community; but the prefect of the department, instead of yielding to the wishes of the municipal magistrates, has sent into the locality a lay teacher. Hence the complaints of the Archbishop of Rennes. He reproached the prefect with having violated liberty of instruction and the authority of the heads of families.

Certainly, if the question is examined in an abstract point of view, this prelate had some right to attack the decision of the prefect. But how could the Archbishop of Rennes invoke in good faith the great principle of liberty of instruction? Is it not true that wherever the Papal clergy exert a preponderating influence, they oppress the teachers without pity, and dismiss those who are not the humble slaves of the priests? As to the authority of the heads of families, has not the Church of Rome trodden it under foot at all times and in all countries? Are parents free at Rome, or in Spain, or in Austria, to give to their children the education which seems to them the most appropriate? Are they not constrained, under pain of incurring legal penalties, to confide their sons and their daughters to the instructions of the curé, and to submit them to the observance of all ecclesiastical regulations? Much more. In the Mortara affair, and in so many others analogous to it, has Popery hesitated to place its power above the most elementary applications of paternal authority? What is it then which allows the Archbishop of Rennes to present himself as the advocate of the heads of families? Quis tulit Gracchos de seditione quarentes? Is it astonishing that in Roman Catholic countries the State follows the example given by the Church? Let the priests first bow before the sacred rights of the domestic sanctuary, and they may then ask with success that the paternal power should be respected!

The Senate passed to the order of the day on the petition of the Archbishop of Rennes. It is a serious and salutary lesson for the clerical party. God grant that the heads of the Roman Church may understand this warning and profit by it! The common law is the only solid guarantee for the different religious communions. Liberty for all! Equality for all! See the maxims which serve as a safeguard for every one. But so long as the members of the sacerdotal body shall demand exorbitant privileges for themselves, and shall try to chain down their opponents under a despotic yoke, they cannot complain that the same arms should be turned against them. The law of reprisals is as old as the world.

SPEECH OF M. GUIZOT ON THE OPERATIONS OF THE BIBLE SOCIETY.

The Protestant societies have celebrated their annual assemblies at Paris. Before giving you some details concerning these meetings, I shall call your attention to a remarkable address delivered by M. Guizot as chairman of the Bible Society meeting.

Last year M. Guizot had provoked vehement and legitimate remonstrance by supporting the Pope's temporal power. It had seemed very much out of place for a Protestant to take in hand, at a meeting of one of our religious societies, the favourite thesis of the Ultramontanes. But this time our illustrious co-religionist has chosen a very different subject, and propounded excellent ideas upon the power of the Holy Scriptures.

He admits that the Bible has now become the subject of animated discussion, and the object of violent attack. He is not alarmed by this controversy; the condition of truth upon earth is to be opposed by error. "We have nothing to fear for the sacred books," said he; "they are beyond the test of free examination . . . and learning will no more destroy them than persecution. . . . The Sacred Scriptures partake of the character and the power of the general laws of the world; they may be discussed and called in question, but they will none the less exercise upon humanity the power which comes to them from sources superior to human science."

The great speaker then developed two characteristics of the Scriptures. "Historically," says he, "the Bible and the Gospel comprise a fact, a spectacle without equal. It is the history—let me be forgiven this expression—the history of God Himself in His relation to souls and human societies. . . . No other national and religious history presents us with anything like it. Everywhere else, among the traditions and monuments of nations, you will only meet with gods who are evidently of human invention. . . . The Bible and the Gospel bear quite another character; it is the presence and activity of God who has made man and the world, and who governs them."

After having shown how the religion of the Scriptures is advancing to the conquest of the whole world, M. Guizot continued in these terms: "Since humanity has existed, and wherever it exists, it has been in the presence of great problems affecting itself, in the investigation of which its deepest emotions have been absorbed. What are we? Whence do we come? Whither do we go? What do our nature and our destiny signify? Such are the questions naturally and inevitably raised in the human soul. Our sacred books alone have for these questions precise, positive, and striking answers. They alone explain to man the present, and reveal to him his future. On the one hand, the presence and constant action of God in the world; and on the other, satisfaction for the imperious moral necessities of humanity. Behold what the Bible and the Gospel are, and what they do. See why it suffices to spread them, and to keep them constantly under the eyes of men, in order to ensure their sovereignty! The causes and the guarantees of this sovereignty are above the doubts, the labours, and the discoveries of science; they reside in the moral and general instincts of humanity itself. Let us then pursue our course with confidence," &c.

We thank M. Guizot for having rendered so brilliant a testimony to the Divine origin and authority of the Bible. His speech has been published by the political press of Paris, and must produce good effects in a country which knows so little of the Word of God.

ANNIVERSARIES OF RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES AT PARIS.

A few words now about our religious societies. I shall be very brief, because the facts contained in the reports would offer but little interest to foreign readers.

Thanks be to God, the general impression of these anniversaries has been good. Many pastors and elders came to attend them from the different provinces of France. The receipts of the societies have not experienced a sensible diminution, notwithstanding the commercial and financial crisis caused by the civil war in the United States. The spirit which has prevailed in the greater part of the meetings has been strictly Evangelical. The audacious negations of the Rationalistic school impose upon us great and sacred duties: all pious men must loudly affirm the essential doctrines of the faith, and show by their words, as well as by their example, that the Protestant Churches remain faithfully attached to the Saviour-God.

We have two Bible societies: the Protestant Bible Society, which applies itself almost exclusively to the dissemination of copies of the sacred volume among the members of our National Church; and the French and Foreign Bible Society, which carries on its work among the Roman Catholics as well as among Protestants. During the past year the first of these associations disposed of about 14,700 copies of the Old and New Testaments. The other Bible Society distributed 91,800 copies of the sacred books. It is rejoicing to see that the French manifest an increasing eagerness for the reading of the Scriptures. Is it not the more and more universal knowledge of the inspired Word, which will introduce among the ideas and habits of our people convictions more firm, a piety more living, and acts more conformed to the Divine will? The Jesuits know well that the propagation of the Bible is the most efficacious means of crushing the empire of superstition and spiritual tyranny. They too labour with all their strength to prevent the circulation of the Scriptures; but the French Government, notwithstanding all their intrigues and denunciations, permits the Bible colporteurs freely to accomplish their task.

The Society for the History of French Protestantism pursues its labours with zeal and constancy. At the annual meeting, a Paris pastor read an interesting notice of Lafèvre d'Étaples, one of the founders of the Reformation in our country. This Lafèvre was a Romish priest—a professor of the University of Paris—who at the commencement of the sixteenth century prepared the way for Calvin. He even preceded Luther and Zwingli in his objections against Popery. But his opinions were mystical, his character timid, and after having taken the first steps in the way, he dared not go on to the end.

The Religious Tract Society held its general meeting, under the presidency of Professor Rousseau Saint-Hilaire. The honourable speaker testified, among other things, his regret that there were not tracts enough addressed to the intelligent and rich. It is, in effect, a grave mistake to set almost entirely aside so influential a class of persons. Intelligent and wealthy people have religious needs as well as the poor; their conscience must be admonished, their heart awakened, and their soul saved by the same means.

The committee of this society has taken an important resolution, which is, to sell its little works, and no longer to give any of them away. This measure has diminished the number of tracts put into circulation; but persons who buy them make a better use of them. Men in general only value that which exacts some sacrifice on their part.

The Evangelical Society, whose principal aim is to make known pure Christian doctrine among the Romish population, has obtained abundant blessings during the past year. M. Henry Lutteroth, who occupied the chair, thanked the Imperial Government for having at length authorised the reopening of Protestant schools in the department of the Haute-Vienne, and for having efficaciously protected the exercise of religious liberty. The reader of the report, M. Victor de Pressensé, said that the committee employ sixty-four agents—that is, twelve pastors, ten evangelists, and forty-two schoolmasters and mistresses. The receipts amounted to 156,989f., and the expenses to 174,994f.

The Sunday School Society makes remarkable progress. The great majority of our flocks now possess these admirable institutions. The committee has published with success books intended for childhood and youth.

The Missionary Society, presided over by Count de Laborde, continues to obtain the sympathy of our churches. Its receipts have been 161,348f., a considerable sum for the small number of French Protestants. But the expenses have been greater still, for they have amounted to 205,247f. There is, therefore, a deficit of more than 40,000f. in the accounts of the society. Almost all our missionaries are settled in South Africa, towards the Cape of Good Hope. Two or three have been sent into China. The committee has resolved to found a missionary station in the French colony of Senegal, whose governor is a pious Protestant.

The Central Society of Evangelisation, which is occupied almost exclusively in carrying the Gospel to the scattered Protestants of France, has received 140,852f., and expended 127,066f. It has opened places of worship in a large number of parishes. It also supports a Preparatory Theological Seminary, which helps young men well suited to enter upon the pastoral career.

Last of all, I would mention the Society for the Encouragement of Primary Instruction. Its receipts have been 76,921f., and its expenses 82,400f. The education of the popular classes is far from having attained its last limit in France. Romanism gives a bad example in this respect; it is hostile rather than favourable to the diffusion of elementary knowledge in the lower ranks of society. The Protestants follow a better course. But they have need of being supported and encouraged; for the committee have shown that many of our smaller churches are deprived of primary schools. This is an evil and an error.

CONFERENCES ON THE REVISION OF THE TRANSLATIONS OF THE BIBLE IN THE FRENCH LANGUAGE.

The Pastoral Conferences, which were held at Paris at the same time as the meetings of our religious societies, devoted three days to the discussion of the following proposition: The Duty of French Protestants to Obtain and to Publish a New Translation of the Bible.

I believe that the same question has been more than once agitated in England and in the United States. There are among us pastors and theologians belonging for the most part to the Rationalist or negative tendency, who have violently attacked the versions of Martin and of Osterwald, two old and venerated pastors of France and French Switzerland. They profess that these translations are incorrect and defective; and they call attention to vicious phraseology, misconstructions, and so forth.

Some of these censures are well-founded, no doubt. No human work is exempt from faults. But would the Rationalists make a better translation of the Bible? On the contrary, recent and sad experiences have proved that the Holy Scriptures would be disfigured and falsified in their hands. The majority of the pastoral conferences wisely determined that—without ignoring the imperfections of the versions used in France, and without discouraging individual labours on this subject—it did not believe it could take the initiative of a revision, and passed to the order of the day.

OPENING OF M. FREDERIC MONOD'S NEW CHAPEL IN PARIS.

On Sunday afternoon, April 27, the new chapel built by the Evangelical Reformed Church of Paris in the Rue Petits-Hôtels was solemnly dedicated to the worship of God. We are thankful to be able to say that services of this kind frequently take place in the French capital. In the present case, however, the proceedings derived peculiar interest from their association with a venerable brother who has devoted long-continued effort and great toil to the work, and whose joy was this day shared by all those who have received, in such great numbers, through his instrumentality, the spiritual life by which they are animated. In translating an account of this interesting event from the Archives du Christianisme, we must, before we proceed further, offer to M. Frederic Monod our own congratulations on its occurrence; and in doing so we are sure we also most fully express the sentiments of those of our readers who are best aware how long and how faithfully M.

Monod has upheld the standard of the Cross in the first city of Continental Europe. We rejoice that, notwithstanding the long delay which has occurred in his securing a suitable place in which to conduct Divine service—for that which he has just quitted was utterly unworthy of being for years the sanctuary of a congregation surrounded by architecture like that of Paris—he has at length obtained a building expressly erected for the flock of which he is pastor.

Twenty-nine Evangelical ministers of various denominations (including the Reformed Church, Independents, Wesleyans, Baptists, Church of England, Calvinistic Methodists, &c.) and the elders of the Evangelical Churches of Paris united with the pastors and elders of the Church for this Christian festival.

At the moment in which M. Frederic Monod deposited the Bible at the foot of the pulpit, a choir stationed in the gallery spontaneously chanted a hallelujah, which opened this reunion in an edifying way.

M. Frederic Monod then said: "In th name of the living and true God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, we take possession of this new place of worship, which we owe to His goodness. Our first act is to deposit publicly at the foot of this pulpit, to remain there in permanence, the Word of God, as the infallible and sovereign rule of worship and Christian instruction. This is why we desire first of all to read a portion of that Word. We have chosen the prayer of Solomon at the solemn dedication of the temple which he built" (1 Kings viii. 22—61).

After the reading of the Bible, M. Adolphe Duchemin ascended the pulpit to pronounce the inaugural prayer; then, whilst the assembly sang the hymn, "Thrice holy Lord!" M. Frederic Monod took his place, and delivered a discourse, choosing two texts, Ps. cxxvii. 1, and 1 Cor. ii. 2. "The external view of this building," said the preacher, "indicates what we are, and at what we aim. Above the door is the inscription: 'Evangelical Worship.' It is not, then, any kind of worship, but worship according to the Gospel, which we seek to offer to God. Below this inscription is an open Bible, with this passage: 'Jesus Christ is the way, the truth, and the life.' The Bible is the only foundation of this worship; it proclaims that Jesus Christ is the only way, the only truth, the only life. Above all is the Cross, the sum of revelation, the only means of salvation for sinful man." The preacher then gave a sketch of the origin and history of the Reformed Evangelical Church of Paris, which had its beginning in 1849, assembling, during four years, in a small room, at the end of a little court, up a wooden staircase; and afterwards, for nine years, in a blacksmith's shop, white-washed, where it was abundantly blessed. The preacher then proceeded to offer a series of appropriate remarks upon his twofold text.

After singing a hymn, M. E. de Pressensé expressed, in the name of his Church, and of all the Evangelical Christians of Paris, the delight with which this day's proceedings had filled every heart. M. L. Burnier (of Morges, Switzerland,) expressed his gratitude to God at hearing that there were thirty-three places of Evangelical worship in Paris. Forty years ago there were only three. This was a progress which would not be stopped, and it might be hoped that, in forty years more, the number would have greatly increased. It would be so if they willed it. After the singing of another hymn, M. Guillaume Monod concluded the proceedings by fervent prayer.

Frankfort, May, 1862.

THE RELIGIOUS ASPECT OF THE RECENT POLITICAL EVENTS IN PRUSSIA.

I informed you in my last letter (Evangelical Christian, April, p. 195) that the regards of Germany were directed towards Prussia, all here having witnessed with lively solicitude the dissolution of the Chamber of Deputies, the resignation of M. von Bethmann-Hollweg, Minister of Public Instruction and of Ecclesiastical Affairs, and a ministerial crisis of which the issue was not then known. This interest on behalf of the greatest Protestant State of Germany has gone on increasing in proportion as events have unfolded themselves. We will now follow the course of these events, not to relate what your readers already know, but to enable them to appreciate the moral and religious bearing of the facts referred to.

After having dissolved the Chamber, in the delusive hope of obtaining by this appeal to the people a less liberal assembly, the King, ill-advised, has committed a second fault, in parting with a Ministry which had the confidence of the country, to nominate another which cannot inspire it with any. Those who know this Prince, and who esteem the uprightness of his character, and his love for his people, have been grieved to see him entering on a path so full of peril. His good intentions in respect of the administration of public instruction and of the Church are manifested by the choice which he has made of a successor to M. von Bethmann-Hollweg in this important department. The new Minister is M. von Mühler, member of the Superior Ecclesiastical Council (Oberkirchenrath), a friend of M. von Bethmann, and who presided after him over the Kirchentag of Bremen, in 1860. M. von Mühler justly possesses the confidence of religious men, and he would doubtless have justified this confidence under circumstances less difficult. The adversaries of the present Ministers have published in all their organs that M. von Mühler belongs to the politico-religious party of the Kreuz Zeitung, and that he shares the views of the celebrated Dr. Stahl. This is not correct, but his Evangelical principles suffice to make him suspected by certain extreme parties, who, in Germany, cannot comprehend that true piety can be in alliance with views truly liberal. And if this be so, we must allow that it is the fault of a religious party which, on its part, confounds liberalism, even of the most sincere kind, with impiety.

However this may be, one cannot but regret greatly that the first public act of the Minister of Worship was a grave fault, committed in concert with the whole Ministry with which he is connected. That Ministry addressed to all the authorities of the kingdom a circular, by which it engaged them to use all their influence in the elections, in order that their result should be conformable to the views of the Government. M. von Mühler, as Minister of Public Instruction, had to address this ministerial rescript to all the universities of the kingdom. Immediately he received from the universities of Berlin, of Bonn, and of other places, energetic protests, in which the professors flatly refused to become the political instruments of the Ministry, and demanded, in this respect, the fullest liberty to act according to their own convictions. These protests, supported by those of a multitude of other functionaries, in all branches of the Administration, have produced throughout the country a profound sensation. They have powerfully contributed to the result of the elections, but in a sense directly opposed to the intentions of the Ministry. May it not now be feared that the influence of M. von Mühler is irrevocably broken and lost in the universal unpopularity of his colleagues? And, what is worse in all this is, that the religious principles of this respectable Minister bear, in the eyes of the Liberal party, the melancholy responsibility of his faults. Thus Germany falls more and more into the fatal error which consists in identifying on the one hand religion and absolutism, and on the other liberty and irreligion. Nothing is more injurious to vital Christianity than this unhappy confusion.

The result of the elections is known to you. The electors have returned to the Chamber of Deputies all those members who had voted for the famous proposition which caused the dissolution; and the party of progress has gained many other seats lost by the Conservatives. By the time these sheets shall be in the hands of your readers the new Chamber will have opened. What will it do? What will the Government do? What will the King do? Such are the questions which every one asks himself with anxiety—with an anxiety the greater in proportion as a more lively interest is felt by the inquirer in respect of Prussia, her king, and those grave religious and moral questions which are now agitated in the heart of this great nation. It is confidently asserted that certain extreme parties in high places have not been sparing of dangerous counsels in favour of reactionary coups d'état. But these counsels have not availed to shake the integrity and loyalty of the monarch. May God always conduct him by His light and wisdom, so that the love of his people may be his strength.

A GOVERNMENT REVOLUTION IN ELECTORAL HESSE.

If any lamentable example were needed of what may befall a country whose Government betrays every principle of right and public morality to walk in the ways of despotism and arbitrary power, that example would be found abundantly in the little State of Electoral Hesse. Here, moreover, is a man making a high profession of Christianity—the Minister Hassenpflug—who, ten years ago, by a coup d'état, despoiled a German people of its constitution, and of all its rights solemnly sworn to by the Prince. For ten years this loyal people has struggled against its Government by the legal means of the elections, without ever having been led aside into outbreaks or disorder by the injustice, the persecutions, and the vexations of every description to which it has been subjected; for ten years the majority of the other Governments of Germany, and especially Prussia, have interfered officially on behalf of the re-establishment of right; for ten years the outraged public conscience has protested, through the medium of the entire press, against this unjust despotism; for ten years each representative assembly of Hesse has demanded its constitution, and has been immediately dissolved; the Germanic Diet itself has concluded by taking up the cause of an oppressed people: all, however, in vain! The Government of Cassel, on the eve of new elections, has just taken a step certainly unheard of hitherto in the history of constitutional nations. It has decreed to refuse the right of voting to every citizen who shall not declare beforehand his adhesion to the constitution arbitrarily established by the Prince ten years ago! In other words, the mass of the population is put beyond the pale of the law, and an insignificant minority of employés and flatterers of power will alone be called on to form a Chamber to represent the country, and to vote taxes! And it is in the name of religious principles that men, calling themselves religious, commit these iniquities! Can we be astonished if the people imbibe hatred for these principles, and consider as hypocrites all those who profess them? To act thus, is it not systematically to teach contempt for right, for justice, and for morality? Is it not to degrade religion into a mere instrumentum regni? And what is most astonishing is, that the majority of the men who govern in this spirit are men of conviction; men firmly convinced of a fatal error; men who make a religion of their politics and a scheme of policy of their religion; men who seek their ideal in some indescribable theocracy or Divine government—the worst of all despotisms, for it pretends to rule souls not less than bodies. One of the most justly-esteemed publications of Germany, the Protestantische Monatsblätter, edited by Dr. Gelzer, has given, in its February number of this year, a complete review of the tragical history of Electoral Hesse during the last ten years. We refer to this paper all those of your readers who may desire a full knowledge of the facts.

Happily, the excess of the evil will shortly bring about the remedy. All the electors of the country, its magistrates at their head, have protested against the tyrannical ordinance I have just quoted. The Prussian Government has proposed to the Germanic Diet of Frankfort to prevent its execution, and this same Government is preparing for direct intervention by its army on behalf of an oppressed people. And now will your English readers believe me when I add that there are in Electoral Hesse, and elsewhere, a whole school of theologians, and a multitude of ministers, noted for their orthodoxy, who, for the last ten years, have religiously advocated all the measures of the Government of Cassel, and regard the people who are struggling legally for their rights only as a nation of rebels? They believe, in all sincerity, that there is no other interpretation to be given to the 13th chapter of the Epistle to the Romans.

DEATH OF DR. RUDELBACH.

Let us turn from these lamentable errors, and pay a tribute of love and veneration to an eminent man whom his Master has recently removed from the passing scenes of this world. I refer to Dr. Rudelbach, who died some weeks since, and in whom the Lutheran Church of Germany has lost one of its most learned theologians, one of its most influential writers, and one of its most pious pastors. Rudelbach, well known by different works of unusual solidity, was especially so as chief editor of the Zeitschrift für Lutherische Theologie und Kirchen, which he published in conjunction with his friend, Dr. Gericke, of Halle. This miscellany bears the most thorough characteristics of Lutheranism, but also all the marks of the most sincere conviction, and of genuine piety. Rudelbach supplied it with numerous articles, always distinguished by vast learning, by living faith, and by an impartiality which could always heartily recognise the good and the true beyond the pale of his own Church. Even those who were far from sharing all his theological or ecclesiastical views never read him without instruction and profit. Rudelbach, moreover, was one of a small number of German theologians whose eyes are open to all that is false in the relations of the State to the Church in our country, and he has often employed his vigorous pen in pleading eloquently for the independence of the Church in respect of the temporal power. This man of God leaves a great void in the Lutheran press and in the Church militant of Jesus Christ. May this void be, in some measure, filled up by the union, the love, and the zeal of all those who love and adore the same Saviour. It was to that Saviour that Rudelbach consecrated his long and noble life, some particulars of which we purpose to give to your readers on a future day.

ITALY.

Bologna, May 19, 1862.

KING VICTOR EMMANUEL IN THE SOUTH:
PUBLIC REJOICINGS.

The long-looked-for visit of Victor Emmanuel to the Southern provinces has come at last. The reception of the King in Naples and Sicily has been most brilliant. With the exception of the hearty English cheer, which Italian lungs cannot raise or sustain, it resembled the ovation which awaits our own loved Queen wherever she goes. The unanimity and fervour of the multitude has defied the descriptive powers of the oldest correspondents. It is without a parallel, and has enshrouded the Bourbon faction in gloom, and cheered the sad hearts of the loyal Italians. To tell the truth, the friends of Italy have been very downcast for some months by the news of widespread disorder in the South, which not all the efforts of the clerical and retrograde parties in Rome and elsewhere seemed sufficient to account for. There is now no mistake as to the feelings of the seven millions in the late kingdom of the Two Sicilies. It is equally certain that, were an opportunity given, the Roman people would quite equal—for nothing could surpass—the demonstration of the Neapolitans. Once more the solution of the Roman question is believed to be at hand. High hopes are again centred in the French Emperor, though the Sphinx of the Tuileries is still silent. His cousin goes to salute the King at Naples, Goyon leaves Rome, and Lavalette returns to his post, the French garrison in the eternal city is being reduced, but no one can tell whether the finale of this tortuous policy is determined, or whether the promise is being renewed for the hundredth time to the ear, to be again broken to the heart.

THE GOVERNMENT CURBING THE PRIESTS.

The Italian Government begins to feel itself strong enough, not only to hold its own against the priests, but also to curb them. Commissions are appointed to look after the revenues of the "pious houses." The Bishop of Fano is in the hands of the officers of the Crown. The canons of the Naples Cathedral are to be formally proceeded against by the tribunals. Half-a-dozen of the poorer members of the Florence Priests Protection Society, still under the ban of the Bishop, are supported by the authorities. The house and printing press of the Pisan bishop have been strictly searched for treasonable documents. Orders have issued from Turin that the services of the priests are to be dispensed with at the national festival on the first Sabbath of June.

The periodic celebration at Saluzzo, with great pomp, of the slaughter of the Waldenses, on the banks of the Po, has been as strictly prohibited as was the "Christian remembrance" of the Huguenot massacre at Toulouse by the French Government. This town has been greatly delighted by the trial, and condemnation to fine and imprisonment, of several priests, for disrespectful conduct towards the dead body of Count Rota, President of the Court of Appeal in Bologna, who, from occupying a distinguished position, and contributing powerfully to the unification of Italy, was considered subject to Papal anathema, and undeserving of Christian burial. A few English tourists the other day found the Convents of La Verna and Camaldoli in the hands of the military, who were searching for secret correspondence with the Roman directors of brigand insurrection. Indeed, it is now seriously proposed, as a last trial, to do with the priests what has been so successfully done with national guardsmen, soldiers, judges, &c.—remove them from one curacy to another, so as to diminish their influence over the populace.

THE PRESS TAKING A NEW POSITION IN RELATION TO THE PAPACY.

The liberal press is gradually opening its columns to the discussion of the religious element in the Roman question. This is a great advance, for formerly it was eschewed on all hands. We have to thank the obstinacy of the Pope and the unswerving adherence of his creatures to the hated Papal system for such a cheering sign of progress. The Nazioni (the Times of Tuscany) has given us a masterly exposition of the relations of the civil and ecclesiastical powers. The Gazzetta del Popolo has been noticing the Evangelical schools of Florence in a cordial and approving manner, though only last year one of its ablest writers, whose sympathies are in the direction of Protestantism, was refused insertion for some of his articles, with the editorial assurance that no religious discussions must be imported into the Italian question, with which it had nothing to do! The Chiacchiera, one of the comic journals of Tuscany, was seized the other day for one of the cleverest of a series of priestly caricatures. The Vatican is represented at the top of a flight of steps, with the motto above, "The incoming takes the place of the outgoing tenant." Accordingly, by the right-hand door are fleeing away the Pope, Antonelli, Merode et hoc genus omne; while on the left are entering Victor Emmanuel and Garibaldi, preceded by an apostolic-looking man bearing the Bible, and a bright-eyed damsel carrying the cross.

The Movimento, of Genoa, quotes, with expressions of approval, an able article in the Alleanza, of Milan, on Cavour's famous dictum, "A Free Church in a Free State." The Movimento makes the quotation as a beginning to similar views which it is about to publish on the vital argument of religious liberty, judging that the time has come when the press of Italy should consider maturely such questions, owing to the special relations of the country with the Papacy, in the right settlement of which the future prosperity of Italy lies. The article of the Alleanza shows the deep significance of the principle of a Free Church in a Free State, and applies it to the case of the Papal Church.

PRAYER FOR THE SPANISH PRISONERS.

A united prayer-meeting was held in Florence lately in connexion with the Matamoras persecution. It was fitting that the city of Francesco and Rosa Madias should plead with God for the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound in Spain. The meeting was so interesting, that the brethren are carrying on a weekly r union for prayer on this subject.

TURKEY.

MURDER OF AN AMERICAN MISSIONARY—STATISTICS OF THE CENTRAL TURKISH MISSION—STEPS TOWARDS SELF-SUPPORT OF THE NATIVE CHURCHES.

The Rev. G. H. White writes to the Secretary of the Turkish Missions' Aid Society, from Aleppo, under date of April 16. The annual meeting of the Mission to Central Turkey was then being held in that city, and the communication expresses the warm thanks of the members of the mission, in their united capacity, for the assistance obtained from Great Britain, through the Society. The letter then proceeds with a statement of facts: the first is indeed a most mournful one:—

You will sympathise with us on account of the circumstances of sorrow amid which we meet. One of the most energetic and zealous of our number, Mr. Coffing, of Adana, has fallen by the hand of the mountain robber; the first martyr from the American Mission to Turkey. It is a voice, as from heaven, saying to each of us, "What thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." We have strong reason to hope that by means of his death that wild, mountainous region, hitherto impenetrable, may be opened to Gospel influences.

In our work the past year has been one of general prosperity. Although no marked outpourings of the Holy Spirit have occurred, still our congregations have been preserved in harmony, and 100 members have been added to the churches. In this "Central Mission" there are now fourteen churches, with nearly 800 communicants; twenty-eight separate congregations, averaging 125 hearers each, to whom the Gospel is preached in simplicity. There are forty-three common schools, containing 1,700 children of both sexes, whose belief, and almost only text-book, is the Bible; besides, some 1,700 adults, men and women, are learning, or have learnt already, to read the Word of Life. The department to which your Society's funds have been chiefly applied is the aiding of young men fitting for the native ministry. Including helpers and teachers, there are seventy labourers in the field, of whom the most part spend part of their time in study, and part in evangelising the villages, and these have nearly all received aid from your Society.

At the present annual meeting we have taken decided steps towards making our work "self-supporting," throwing the maintenance of native pastors and teachers, as much as possible, upon the native churches. Still, for some time to come, they will need our counsel and aid; but we hope, as our work among the Armenians closes, a still wider work will open to us among the Moslems.

POLYNESIA.

EXPULSION OF MISSIONARIES FROM TANNA.

It is our painful duty to record the expulsion of the agents of the London Missionary Society from Tanna, the largest island in the southern portion of the New Hebrides group, in Western Polynesia. Two missionaries were located there in 1842, but after a brief stay they barely escaped with their lives. Native teachers from the neighbouring islands afterwards returned to the place, and endeavoured to introduce Christianity amongst these cannibals. One of them was murdered, but the attempt was not given up, and some little progress was made during the succeeding ten years. At length, in 1858, three European missionaries again took up their abode here, of whom two, the Rev. J. G. Paton and the Rev. Mr. Matheson, continued to labour on, until the close of last year, when the natives of Erromanga, the murderers of Mr. and Mrs. Gordon, went over to Tanna, and urged the savages of that island to murder their missionaries.

The idea was taken up and the deed resolved upon. The conspiracy among the heathen portion of the population soon became general, and the Christian portion at once prepared to go to war, to defend the missionaries and execute vengeance. The missionaries, though knowing their lives were in danger, induced the Christian natives to lay aside their spears and clubs for a time. One of the chiefs of the heathen party then prophesied that he would kill the chief who defended the missionaries, and would bring a hurricane and destroy their property. Strange to say, two days afterwards the chief alluded to died, and a few days later a hurricane came. The storm, however, was not so relentless as the savage, and the mission property was spared; but the fruit trees and property of the savages were blown down and destroyed. Nothing could now restrain the desire of the Christian natives for vengeance; and, the other party thirsting for the missionaries' blood, a collision ensued. The missionaries, acting on the advice of their friends, barricaded their house, and remained within while the combat raged without, the house being sometimes surrounded by one party and sometimes by the other. This was repeated for several days, till it became known that the heathen party determined to break through the house and murder the missionaries, when the latter made for the bush in the night, and remained there several days, till they were nearly starved. When the heathen found the missionaries gone, they burnt and destroyed the entire property, to the value of 1,000*l*. After innumerable hardships and hairbreadth escapes, the devoted missionaries were at length rescued. A sail appeared in sight, signals of distress were made on the island, and in due time an armed boat was sent to the rescue. The Rev. Mr. Paton and the Rev. Mr. Matheson and Mrs. Matheson were taken to Aneiteum, and after having a consultation with the brethren there, it was thought desirable that Mr. Paton should come on to Sydney, to lay the case before the Church there, and procure a small vessel by means of which they might carry on their labours on the islands in the vicinity of Tanna, till a favourable opportunity should present itself of again prosecuting the good work among its benighted islanders. The noble expounders of the Gospel have been driven back, but they are not dismayed. They are determined to return to the charge as soon as possible.

Miscellaneous Intelligence.

THE MAY MEETINGS.

If we were called upon to state in a single sentence our impression of the great religious anniversaries which have been held in the course of the last month, we should say that they were distinguished by the business-like air by which they were pervaded. There was little of the showy or ornamental about them; throughout there was the sense of a hard, solid reality—the hearing of men who had a great work in hand, and who were more intent on having that work done than how they might appear to others in the doing of it. This is the more remarkable as the present year was one in which, as the directors of the different societies well knew, their doings would be inspected by a wider circle than usual, and more than ordinarily critical eyes would be fixed upon them. Under these circumstances, it would have been excusable if those who have the arrangement of those meetings had aimed somewhat at display, and made some little effort to array their societies and their agencies in their most brilliant colours. There would, for instance, have been small blame imputed to them if each of our great missionary societies had given the most eminent and the most honoured of its servants an Exhibition holiday, and brought them upon the platform at Exeter Hall, to tell with their own lips what great things God was doing through their means among the heathen. But it was not so. It seems never to have been thought of. The directors appear to have felt throughout that the work, and not the workers, was the great object: and that if the former had no attraction for Christian hearts, any stimulus to be derived from the latter would be unhealthy and unsound. And so they employed only those means which came to hand, and called to the front only those missionaries whom physical debility, or other equally urgent causes, had forced for a time out of the mission field. The result showed that they had judged rightly in believing that the missionary cause is now so firmly fixed in the hearts of our churches, that it needs no extraordinary impulse. The reports were crammed, from title-page to finish, with solid, hard, but by no means dry, realities; and the speeches for the most part conformed to the report. There was less of idle declamation, or speaking for display, than we ever remember before. Here and there, to be sure, an old gentleman, bred up in the vicious school which was so prevalent a few years ago, would crack his second-hand jokes, and prose about his own sensations and emotions; but the very recurrence of such speeches, by their incongruity with the earnest, business-like, solemn mode of grappling with the question that characterised the speeches they struck across, served to remind us of the elevation to which the cause had reached since those dreary days when that style of speaking was acceptable.

To those who attend the meetings, while they attend them, of course, the speeches are the great charm. But to all who are interested in the advance of Christ's kingdom among men the reports have by far the chief interest. And it happens that the reports are this year of surpassing interest. Whether we look at the treasurer's or the secretary's department—that is, whether we examine what Christians at home have done for God, or how God has met them in answering blessings on His cause abroad, there is equal room for delight and gratitude. It was naturally feared that the sore distress which has fallen upon the chief seats of our manufacturing industry would have been seen in the diminished receipts of our religious societies. The remarkable fact is that one society after another has to report not a diminution, but a positive increase; one after another records with thankfulness that the year just past has supplied greater abundance to Christ's treasury than any former year where extraordinary efforts were not called for. Surely this is matter for thankfulness, recalling the times when an Apostle could characterise it as an instance of God's grace that the liberality of the Churches had abounded out of their deep poverty. And as there was never greater liberality at home, so there has never been greater or more general activity abroad. We recollect the stirring days when Williams had to report that island after island in the Pacific had thrown away their idols and declared for Christ. We are not unmindful of the Baptist successes in Jamaica, where the missionaries were borne down by the crowds of inquirers that flocked to them, when the additions to the churches from month to month could be counted by the hundred. But there has gone by no year equal to the last, when God's Spirit seems to be moving, not in one isolated region, but over the whole mission-field. In India, a religious awakening has sprung up quite independent of any direct missionary effort. In the West Indies it is officially reported that the additions to the Church through the late revival exceed in number, and let us hope will excel in steadfastness, the awakenings that preceded the abolition of slavery. By far the most important feature in our eyes is the multiplication of a native pastorate. Without this there can be no security for the missionary or the work. Christianity can never be said to have fairly taken root in a country till the native churches furnish the men for their pastors and the means for their support. This, we are glad to find, is a supreme point aimed at by all the societies, though we think the Church Missionary Society stands forward most prominent in the work; and by all it is attended with great success. If the feature that distinguishes the work at home is, as we said, business, abroad the most signal and cheering feature is the opening of wide doors, and we trust effectual.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY.

The anniversary of this Society, the visible embodiment of the unity of Christ's Church, was held in Exeter Hall, on Wednesday, the 7th ult. The Earl of Shaftesbury, the president of the Society, was in the chair. It was feared that the late unpleasant feeling which has arisen in consequence of the Bicentenary controversy would have cropped out on this occasion; the rather as Canon Miller chose this Society as the means of marking his protest against the Dissenting attacks; but we are glad to say that all such fears were groundless. No other Evangelical clergyman appears to have adopted Canon Miller's views; and we fancy we can discern in the warmth and fervour with which the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the Bishop of Winchester apologised for their unavoidable absence, that each of these distinguished prelates wished it to be understood that in their judgment this small and transient feeling of unpleasantness ought not to be allowed to interfere for a moment with the catholic unity that marks the Bible Society. The report was read by the Rev. Mr. Jackson, the secretary, from which it appeared that the income for the year, from ordinary sources, was about 520*l.* more than had ever been received in any previous year. The total income from all sources was 168,443*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.* The issue of Bibles and Testaments for the year, 1,595,248; that is to say, 999,957 from the dépôt at home, and 595,291 from those abroad. The report proceeded to trace the distribution of these copies of God's Word in the various countries where they had been circulated; and, in the course of that tracing, literally exemplified the words of our Saviour, "The field is the world;" for there was hardly a race of the great family of man—certainly none in which there is a written language (with the exception of the Japanese) into which the Bible has not been translated, and into whose country it has not been sent. Of course we can only here allude to the most important of these; and to begin with that which the report itself began with, France, which is in fact the great lever in all European movements, we are glad to learn that the number of Bibles circulated there last year was larger than was ever known before; the great agent in the distribution being still the colporteur. In Germany, again, the circulation has slightly fallen off, owing to a highly-judicious resolution of the committee to distribute fewer copies gratuitously than they have been accustomed to do. Of course, the purchase of the copies circulated—however small the price—is a much more genuine test of avidity for the work than any gratuitous circulation could be. In Prussia the Society enjoyed the favour of the King, and the Princess Royal, the beloved eldest daughter of England, had presented to the Society a donation of 50*l.* In Austria great obstructions have hitherto been thrown in the way of the circulation of the Bible; but political liberty has lately been accorded to the people, and the committee have applied to the Emperor to complete his work by a free circulation of God's Word, and they are in daily expectation of receiving a favourable answer. In the Scandinavian countries there has been a great and unexpected increase in the demand for the Bible; but in Russia the work meets with serious check, while in Spain and Portugal it is stopped altogether. In Italy there is "a wide door and effectual," and the good seed of the kingdom is being sown broadcast. From China we find that the great obstacles to the spread of the Scriptures come from the Taepings, or rebels—the men from whom, a few years ago, so much hope was entertained of their proving the agents by whom Christianity would be spread over the land.

No sooner was Madagascar thrown open to Christian enterprise than the Society forwarded to the island all the copies of the Scriptures in the Malagassy version that they had in stock—namely, 3,000 Bibles and 800 Testaments; and they at once set to work with a new edition, which will soon be ready. In all our colonies and dependencies the work proceeded apace; and at home the system of colportage and the Bible mission were together carrying the Bible down into strata of society where the ordinary agencies did not penetrate. The committee, commiserating the case of America, now rent with civil war, and fearing that the funds of the religious societies there should suffer, offered assistance to the American Bible Society; but, as might, perhaps, have been expected from our high-spirited kinsmen, the offer was gratefully but decidedly declined.

The speeches were of a very high order. The opening of the address was pithy and characteristic, as all the Earl of Shaftesbury's speeches are, and so short, that we prefer to give it entire.—

The Chairman: My good friends, there is nothing in the report which you have heard to-day, or out of it, that calls for any special observations from the chair, and I shall therefore not interpose between you and the business of the day. The Lord Bishop of London requested that his absence might not be misinterpreted. I request the same for my silence—(applause)—for if speaking were necessary to prove the zeal I entertain for the cause, I could detain you myself to the very close of the meeting, convinced as I am of its intense value, and of its absolute necessity for the spiritual—ay, and I will add, the political welfare of this realm. (Loud applause.) I have but two things to say to you. The first is, that Lord Stratford de Redcliffe was to have attended here to-day and taken part in the proceedings. We were most anxious for the presence of that good man; because you will recollect that, when he was our Ambassador at Constantinople, he lent us the weight of his personal character, and the dignity of his great office, and took the chair of the branch society in the capital of Turkey. (Loud applause.) The next remark I have to make is to announce a contribution to the funds of the Society of 50*l.* from Lord Palmerston. (Loud applause.) You may well cheer. (Renewed applause.) Let me tell you that a more patriotic, and a more thorough Englishman, never lived in this country; and I will give you, in his own words, what he said to me yesterday: "I am most happy to do anything I can for your admirable institution." (Loud and prolonged applause.)

The Bishop of Bangor, who moved the first resolution in a lively speech, brought out the interesting fact that throughout the whole of Wales the contributions to the Society were in the proportion of five to one, as compared with those of the whole of the kingdom; from which, said the Bishop, his Welsh friends drew the conclusion that one Welshman was equal to five Englishmen.

The motion was seconded by Canon Stowell, of Manchester, whose speech had the more interest as he was known to have taken a different view of the Nonconformist controversy from his friend, Canon Miller, of Birmingham. Canon Stowell, we think, gave the pith and manner of the whole controversy as it respects the Bible Society in the following remarks:—

The principles upon which the Society was founded remain unchanged, and whilst they remain unchanged its true and fast friends will not change in their feelings towards it. (Applause.) These principles, as I understand them, are simply three. In the first place, the Word of God should be given to every child of man. In the next place, that it should be given in its entirety and integrity, without human additions or human corruptions—(hear)—given in the authorised version at home, and in the best version that can be secured and circulated abroad. (Hear.) In the third place, that all mankind, if they will, should be invited to co-operate together, without compromise, or concession, in achieving this stupendous object. (Hear, hear.) With the motives that may actuate men, or the peculiarities that may distinguish them, the Society has nothing to do. It asks not what is your creed or religion, or what your shade in politics. It simply asks, do you so regard and reverence this book, that you concur in the great purpose of giving it, whole and undefiled, as correctly and faithfully as human infirmity can secure its circulation, to every sinner on the face of the earth. (Hear, hear.) My Lord, there is something beautiful in the singleness and simplicity of these principles. Maintain them in their integrity, and the Society will be maintained by all who love the Bible.

The Rev. Mr. Taylor, from Canada, gave some interesting accounts of the circulation of the Scriptures in that colony, from which we make the following extract:—

As I am well known by my tongue to be a Highlander by birth—(a laugh)—I may be permitted to mention the case of a large station in the western part of Canada which was settled in the early days of the colony by Highland Scotchmen, for they generally cling together—clannish to the last. (Laughter.) These men settled in a large district of the country; but, unfortunately, they were all benighted, bigoted Roman Catholics, and there were not more than three or four individuals in the entire station who could read. One of our colporteurs got a copy of the Word of God introduced to one of these individuals in the old sublime Gaelic—(laughter)—the language in which they used to pronounce the sweet name of mother. The man to whom the book was given read it stealthily, at first only venturing upon a few sentences, and then putting the book down. Afterwards he would go back to it and read a little more, and then the others heard of it; but as it was in Gaelic, they thought it could not do them much harm. Without dilating further upon this, let me observe that now the entire settlement gathers together, three evenings in the week, to each others' houses, and the few that can read among them read to the rest from the Word of God. There is a copy of the Bible in almost every house, and with that dogged perseverance which is the characteristic of the real Scot, they hold to the book amidst all the threats of bell, book and candle, that can be brought to bear against them from the throne of the Holy Father. (Applause.)

Dean Close, of Carlisle, also alluded to the Bicentenary controversy, and said that, for his part, he lived on terms of the greatest amity with the Dissenters of Carlisle. As a proof of the distinction between Romish and Protestant missions, he alluded to the fact that when, 350 years ago, Rome planted a mission in Japan, the whole island was in a short time Christianised; but before the lapse of a century the Christians had been exterminated, and now there was not a trace of them. In Madagascar, too, there had been a widespread diffusion of Christianity, followed by a cruel persecution. That persecution had ceased; and now they found that the Christian religion had been cherished and preserved by the natives all through their persecutions. How account for the difference between the Protestant and the Romish teaching? He believed the difference lay here, that the Protestant missionaries circulated the Bible, while the Papists only circulated the mass-book.

The other speakers were the Rev. J. Rattenbury, President of the Wesleyan Conference; the Rev. Mr. Richardson, the Rev. Mr. Allon, and the Rev. Dr. Turner, a missionary from the South Seas, who exhibited to the meeting a copy of a recent edition of the Samoan Bible, which had just been issued from the press, and who stated the interesting fact that the expense of former editions had been wholly covered by the sales of copies to the natives in the course of seven years.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

The report read at the anniversary meeting of this Society was full of profound interest, reminding one more of the narratives which Boniface or any other of those earnest propagators of Christianity in heathen Europe might have made before the churches from which they went forth than an ordinary report from our modern societies. On all sides we see Protestant Christianity, with the organization and force belonging to episcopacy, taking root among the heathen nations, and affording the best augury of further diffusion in the creation and maintenance of a native pastorate and native missionary agents, supported in many instances by the willing offerings of the native converts. We have not lately heard the taunting question raised—"What good are missionaries doing?" and we think it is not likely to be again raised in the face of this year's report of the Church Missionary Society.

The report stated that last year their income had fallen short, and left a deficit of 6,000*l*. An effort was therefore made this year to retrench expenditure and to increase the contributions. The committee had succeeded in both objects; they had now a balance in hand, and the income of the Society, including amounts raised at the mission-stations, amounted to 180,000*l*. The Society lamented the loss of its treasurer, the late Mr. Thornton; but the Hon. F. Maude, R.N., had accepted the office in his stead. In Sierra Leone the mission had declared itself self-supporting; schools and churches were supported by the people; and nine parishes had been created, which were presided over by nine native incumbents. The Yoruba mission, on the African coast, was sorely vexed with the inroads of the heathen tribes, of whom the terrible King of Dahomey was the chief; but, on the other hand, the cession of Lagos to the British Government presented a central rallying-point for the interests of Christianity and civilisation. In India more important results still are to be recorded. In the west and north-west—notably in the Punjab—a spirit of inquiry has sprung up among the natives; and at various places missionaries have been sent, in consequence of the people having, of their own accord, and without any European teaching, cast away their idols, and sought for instruction in the Christian faith. In China the missionaries were exposed to great danger, especially at Ningpo, from the attacks of the Taepings; but though requested to leave, they refused to do so, lest their departure should be misinterpreted by the native brethren. So it was at New Zealand, where the missionaries remained at their posts during all the rumours of war, which have now happily passed away. Here, too, the success of the Gospel is most marked. In 1840 Mr. Williams reported that he was the only missionary in the eastern district, with a parish of $2\frac{1}{2}$ degrees. He is now a Bishop over the district, and lately held a synod, composed almost exclusively of Maori clergymen and lay representatives.

The Rev. T. H. Fitzgerald, who has been a missionary at Peshawur for eleven years, gave an interesting account of the progress of improvement. He said:—

A great and general prosperity marks the whole face of the country with which I am acquainted, but I speak more particularly of the Punjab, for there it has been my privilege to labour almost the whole time that its administration has been in the hands of the British Government. I have been privileged to witness the rebuilding of towns and villages and the construction of tanks and wells, all of which tend to the prosperity of the province, and I can refer particularly to one line of route, from Lahore to Moulton, which was the most desolate formerly in the whole province, but throughout which at the present moment—

“Peace and plenty crown the smiling plain.”

It was my lot on one occasion to pass along that route in its former condition, and the moment we entered upon it we came upon a vast and howling wilderness. On each side of the road green canes at least seven feet high, interminable brushwood running the whole distance; before them were coveys of birds darkening the path, while every now and then ravenous wolves, sometimes singly, sometimes in flocks, crossed the path before us. There was scarcely a human being to be seen the whole distance, though everywhere were to be seen the marks of former desolation in destroyed homesteads and burnt villages. But now, my Lord, I am happy to say that we see here and there patches of green pasture, land well cultivated, villages rising to prosperity, one town at least growing into a place of considerable importance, and, running some distance along its side, the railway which connects Lahore with Moulton.

The Bishop of Sierra Leone spoke strongly in support of raising a native ministry, in order to make Christianity permanent among the natives. This was important everywhere: it was especially important in West Africa.

Is there, he said, a single individual in this room who has not heard something of the Sierra Leone Mission, and of the number of valuable lives which have been sacrificed in connexion with it? Of 128 missionaries who have gone forth nearly one-half have died, and a great portion of the remainder has been obliged to leave the field. Now, perhaps, only twenty-four are employed throughout the whole mission; and if that be the case, where and how is the provision to be made for the carrying on of the great work there? Doubtless there are many parts of the mission field where men are wanted, and where it is impossible perhaps to establish a native ministry; but after all, if we do not look the matter fairly in the face, and endeavour to provide for the want of a native self-supporting church, I think we shall have again and again the answer which has been returned by the Church Missionary Society to stations which have asked for help. I rejoice to hear the favourable accounts which are contained in the report which has been read to-day, but, favourable as they are, the result must inevitably be most unsatisfactory, unless men come forward to do the work. The cry from the missions has long been that England gives them neither men nor means. I say, then, that there is a grave necessity for native ministers in every part of the mission-field, if we expect to do anything really valuable. If we expect to see the Gospel and the love of God filling the hearts of the people, we must endeavour, on the spot, to establish a self-supporting native ministry.

The Rev. J. Thomas, who has been for upwards of twenty years a missionary at Tinnevely, dwelt with equal emphasis on the same subject. As to the success of the experiment, he said:—

When I went to Tinnevely there was but one native clergyman. I have seen since then as many as seventeen native clergymen labouring, some independently, and some conjointly with our missionaries, in different parts of the province of Tinnevely; and I will venture to say that the Gospel cannot be more fully, faithfully, or effectually preached in any part of this country than it has been by these men and by the generality of catechists also. How soon we shall have a native synod in Tinnevely it is impossible to say at present.

The other speakers were the Bishop of Ripon, the Hon. A. Kinnaird (who denounced the prohibition of the Scriptures in the Government schools of India), Canon Miller, the Dean of Carlisle, Canon Stowell, &c., &c.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

This Society presents the same gratifying picture in its financial affairs that characterises the Church Mission and the Bible Society. The funds are larger this year than on any former occasion, and amount in all to upwards of 137,000*l.*, but the expenditure is about 1,500*l.* larger still. In the face of these facts, the warm-hearted chairman, Dr. Smith, of Cambridge, in a spirit-stirring address, pledged the meeting that they would, in the course of next year, make up the Society's income to 140,000*l.* The report stretches over a wide field; for the Society's operations are not confined to heathen lands. The continent of Europe, and even Ireland, as well as our colonies, figure in the report; so that the Wesleyan Mission is a heathen, a colonial, a continental, and a home mission, all in one. There must be great economy in the expenditure for organization in such an arrangement as this. The reports from this varied field of operation is, on the whole, encouraging; progress and growth are visible everywhere, but there are few marked features to note; and if there are no startling successes, there are no sad reverses. Perhaps the most interesting circumstance is the report from Australia, where it appears that several natives are successfully employed in preaching the Gospel. This is, we believe, the most hopeful sign that has yet been given of the elevation of the wofully-dark Australian intellect. Due mention was made of the death of Mr. Farmer, Treasurer of the Society, who was the last survivor of the original missionary committee, and had been one of the Society's warmest friends.

The first resolution was seconded by the Rev. Mr. Rattenbury, President of the Conference, and was seconded by the Rev. Dr. Tidman, of the London Missionary Society, who thus pleasantly dealt with the scheme of the founders of that Society, to comprise all denominations within its pale:—

I greatly rejoice in the variety of our missionary agencies. The good men who formed the Society of which I happen to be the secretary thought they had hit upon a scheme by which all sections of the Christian Church might work together in the advancement of this great cause. I marvel that men who were so wise could ever have thought upon a thing so Utopian. It soon proved to be, though very fascinating in theory, utterly impracticable in the working; and I am right glad that such a project failed, because I am convinced that the diversity in our labours, and the devotion of our efforts to those labours, have greatly contributed to the furtherance of the one common cause. (Applause.)

The Rev. Dr. Cairns, of Berwick, also, while he stood up manfully for the Calvinistic doctrine and the Presbyterian government of his own Church, admitted that Wesleyans have a place in the world which could not be left unoccupied. He said:—

Having had opportunities of becoming acquainted with your Society, and having met so many of your representative men at the Evangelical Alliance, I know of what materials your body is composed; and I gladly and gratefully avail myself of this occasion to renew, and, if it were possible, to strengthen, the testimony which I have already borne as to what you have done, what you are doing, and what I hope in the good providence of God you will yet do on a still larger scale. I am not one of those who think your Society has fulfilled its mission, and done its work. Your great army cannot yet be disbanded; for where is it to go? If you come to our Presbyterian Churches, to which allusion has been made this day, we cannot take you in. We have no accommodation for so vast a number of guests as would come to our doors. Were you to repair to our esteemed and beloved brethren who represent our elder Nonconformity, I am not sure that you could find accommodation even there. And were you to seek admittance to the Church of your fathers, though it might open the cathedrals for you, and even elevate some of your body to Episcopal chairs, I very much fear you would not even there find elbow room—"Hear, hear," and a laugh!—and that you would incur the risk of coming into somewhat disagreeable, and not altogether safe, contact with some from whom you would gladly stand apart. (Hear, hear.) I therefore so fully believe that God is doing a great work by you—a work to which, in His providence, He has visibly called and marked you, that my best wish is that you should go on, and go forward—that you should "go unto all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." (Applause.)

The Rev. Morley Punshon, in an eloquent speech, thus summed up the signs of the times as motives for greater zeal in the work of missions:—

There never was a time when it behoved us, the great Methodist people, solemnly, and before God, in no spirit of vaunting, but in the spirit of earnest and holy resolve, to take our pledge, our gage, and battle with sin, and the devil, and the world, more thoroughly and more heartily than we do this day. (Applause.) There are signs around us at home; and there are signs around us abroad. When I look around us at home, I see, as it were, a reproduction of all the old elements that were present at the time of the Saviour's advent. There is the austere and courtly Herodian; the gay and flippant Sadducee; the proud Pharisee gathering up the ruffled fringes of his ecclesiastical prestige, flaunting scornfully past me into the sanctuary. I see them all—all the Jewish oppositions are present amongst us; active, earnest, bitter, some of them, unfortunately, malignant at this day. There is a dread and fell infidelity—an infidelity of whose existence in its blasphemous form I was hardly aware; but some one honoured me by sending me one of their publications the other day. There is a terrible onslaught against all that we consider of good report and lovely amongst the churches themselves. There is—alas! that it should be so—a disposition to whet, to sharpen the sword of controversy, when charity unhappily goes bleeding from the contest, smitten with many wounds.

The other speakers were Dr. Hannab, Mr. Adams, from the South Sea Islands (who said so completely was idolatry abolished in the Friendly Islands, that he could not get an idol to bring home with him), the Rev. A. T. Jones, the Rev. Mr. Baker, the Rev. Mr. Perks, &c., &c.

THE BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

This eldest of our English Protestant missions held its 70th anniversary on the 30th of April. Mr. Baines, M.P., was in the chair, but the attendance was thinner than usual—a feature, we observe, that the organs of the denomination record of several of their other gatherings. We hope this does not indicate any decay of Baptist zeal on behalf of missions. For the body that sent out Carey and Marshman and Knibb to the mission field—the body which was the first to undertake the work, and by their faith and love to provoke others—for them now to hang back would indeed be “as when a standard-bearer fainteth.” But we are persuaded better things of them. A more conclusive test than any accidental attendance is in the amount of contributions; and here, we are happy to find from the report, that the subscriptions amount to a little above 88,000*l.*, the largest sum, they say, that has been received in any year, with the exception of that when special efforts were made in honour of the jubilee year. In reviewing the field of labour, which extends over the East and West Indies, Africa, and France, the report made special mention of the revival that had taken place in Jamaica. The returns of fifty-nine out of sixty-one of the churches in the Union showed that there had been baptized during the year 3,757, and that there were 6,058 inquirers up to the end of last December. Deduct 1,792 individuals, who were on the inquirers’ lists before that date, and there were 8,021 persons who, after a trial of several months, are the hopeful results of this awakening. Looking at the net increase, the committee report with gratitude that it is larger than the churches have had during any one year since the commencement of the mission in Jamaica. To the Baptist churches which have participated in the outpouring of the Divine mercy should be added a more than equal number of persons who have joined other denominations of Christians; and the committee believe that the estimate that 25,000 individuals became the subjects of religion during the movement is not far from the truth. In India, too, the work of evangelization goes steadily forward. More than 200 baptisms testify that the Gospel has been preached, not in word only, but with the power of God. Almost every station in Bengal has received converts from the heathen.

The Chairman, whose love for statistics in all matters is well known, though it has been specially manifested in his elaborate analyses of the reports of education, dwelt at some length on the statements contained in a volume which Mr. Underhill, one of the secretaries, has lately published from personal observation of the state of the West Indies, to show that negro emancipation is not to blame for the depressed state of the West India Islands; and dwelt with great emphasis on the funds the negroes subscribed for the support of the churches.

There were, he said, eighty-seven Baptist churches in Jamaica alone, with an average congregation of 500 each. All these churches, constituted, as I said, of those who lately were in utter darkness, and scarcely able to govern themselves; these churches are self-governed and self-supporting. They do not receive a single sixpence from the Government either for their religious operations or for their schools; and what I think is the crowning triumph of all, they receive nothing from you. You have trained them to independence, to self-reliance, to high organization of the churches; you have placed their pastors, many of them of their own colour; and these, with the deacons and elders, conduct all their operations and maintain all their discipline—and an admirable discipline it is. The churches are founded on the principle of self-sustentation, which I and you believe to be the principle of Christianity. I do not think the various missionary societies can ever do better than train their churches to independence of the mother country.

Dr. Vaughan, who moved the first resolution, made a striking speech, showing, historically, the changes which Christianity had effected—intellectually, socially, and morally—since it came into the world; so that, he said, it might literally be declared that, compared with the state of things under heathendom, we were enjoying new heavens and a new earth. He wound up his remarks in the following noble thought:—

We have to look at these things as part of the process that is going on; and if it does not move so fast as we could wish, let us never forget that it is the characteristic of man to be always in a hurry; it belongs to God never to be in a hurry. There is a stateliness and a deliberation about all His actions! The coming of the day and the night, how slow and imperceptible, and how beautiful! The coming of the winter and of the summer, the seed-time and the harvest, how gradual, how stately! And when He called this world into being, oh! what a lengthened process of change had to take place before it was accounted fit for man to dwell in! And when man had become a sinner, and there was to be a Saviour, 4,000 years passed in the world's discipline before the Saviour came. And so, in a thousand directions besides, you have to mark that His instruction to us is, ever to work and wait. I know nothing of waiting, in relation to His cause, without working; but of this I feel assured, that no man is fit to do a great thing anywhere, and least of all to do a great thing for the cause of God, who has not been thoroughly schooled into the lesson of working and then waiting.

W. H. Watson, Esq., one of the committee, made special reference to the progress of the missions in India, and referred with just gratification to a fact that was full of promise, and that originated with the wife of Mr. Sale, one of the missionaries of the Society—namely, the effort to instruct the women of India in their secluded zenanas. Those who had been accustomed to think of the harems in the East as places of comfort and luxury were greatly deceived; for it appeared that the zenanas were generally the worst apartments in the house, and that they were scenes of unhappiness, and often of strife, the women being kept ignorant and without occupation. Mrs. Sale succeeded in gaining admission to some of them, and began a most useful work, imparting to the ladies a knowledge of reading and of the art of sewing, and so forth, of which they had been totally ignorant. On being compelled to leave Calcutta, Mrs. Sale handed over her work to Mrs. Mullens, the wife of Mr. Mullens, of the London Missionary Society, whose early death the friends of missions had so much reason to deplore. Some of the results of Mrs. Mullens's labours, which had been published, were of the most interesting description, and proved that the women themselves were most anxious to learn, and that the instructing of them would have a most salutary influence, not only upon themselves, but upon their children. In this effort we rejoice to observe another instance of the hearty co-operation of the missionaries of different societies, who seem to get entirely above the region of denominational jealousies in presence of the appalling heathen darkness around them.

The other speakers were the Rev. E. White, Rev. Arthur Mursell, Sir Morton Peto, &c., &c.

THE LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

This was the last of the great missionary meetings; and the record of work which the directors laid before their constituents yielded in interest to none of those that had gone before. Here, too, the treasurer had the good news to tell of increased subscriptions, and, what was more gratifying still, of readiness of men to offer themselves for the work. The ordinary revenue for the year, collected from all sources, amounted to a little above 74,000*l.*, while contributions for special objects amounted to about 5,000*l.* more. Only one missionary in actual service had been removed by death, while twenty-seven new men had been added to the missionary staff, of whom we are glad to observe four were Hindoos. In the Polynesian Islands, those scenes of the earlier triumphs of the Gospel, the news is of a chequered nature; between French intolerance on one side, and native superstition on the other, the missionaries are sorely tried; and in the island of Tanna we are sorry to observe, since the report was completed, the missionaries have been obliged to abandon their work, in consequence of increasing native hostility. But on other islands the good work flourishes; and the most hopeful sign of all is, that a new edition of the Bible in the native dialect has just been completed. In the East and West Indies, in China, and in Africa, the report records success; but the great feature is the happy change which has taken place in the Island of Madagascar. It was the Society's missionaries who first sowed the good seed that has been so remarkably preserved; they have all along invested the history of the island with interest; and now, when in God's good providence it is opened again, they have eagerly sent forth their agents, equipped with a supply of all the copies of the Scriptures in the Malagassy dialect that the Bible Society had in store. This, they say, will considerably increase their expenditure, and they confidently count on the liberality of their friends to supply them with the means.

Lord Radstock, who was in the chair, addressed the meeting in an animated speech, and thus dealt with a touching incident referred to in the report on China:—

I can conceive, he said, of nothing more encouraging than one particular passage in that report—I refer to the account of the poor old man in China. Now I know that it is very much the custom to think that converts from heathenism are a different sort of Christians to what we have here—that they are a sort of inferior grade—but I do confess that this one instance is enough to prove to us the enormous value of one single individual, in whatever country he may be placed, if he be truly gained to the cause of Christ. Here is a poor old man brought to the knowledge of the truth of the Gospel, and through his means, I believe, something like seventy or eighty persons are added to the cause of Christ. I wish there were many Christians like that in England. (Hear, hear.) I wish there were many who, after a few years' knowledge of the truth, could say that their testimony had brought in seventy or eighty more.

The Rev. Mr. Cuthbertson, from Sydney, in Australia, thus dealt with a question which lately, and we believe still agitates the minds of Australian settlers, in reference to the influx of Chinamen into that colony:—

It was also believed that the churches of the Australian colonies could do an important work for China. Some of the politicians of these lands were fearful of being flooded with Chinese; but the churches were hailing a wise and moderate immigration, and were using their best endeavours to give to the Chinese seekers for gold something better than that for which they sought. Already a blessing had attended their efforts. The first drops of the shower had fallen. He might mention the case of a Chinese merchant who had gone to Sydney, and who, professing himself a Christian, asked to be admitted to the Church. He was examined and approved, and his conduct had adorned his profession above many. He was a truly pious man, and was in the habit of calling his countrymen together, from 300 to 400 at a time, and preaching to them the unsearchable riches of Christ. (Applause.) The Word of God had been supplied to them in their own tongue, and he had been deeply affected at times to hear them attempting to sing together hymns in praise of the Lord Jesus. He had listened on the preceding evening to the sweet strains of the Swedish Nightingale, as she sang with feelings of reverence "Come unto me;" yet he did not then feel one tithe so impressed as with the feeble endeavours of the company from the land of Sinim to praise Him who would be Sinim's Lord. (Applause.)

The other speakers were the Rev. Dr. Campbell, of Bradford; the Rev. Dr. Thomson, of Edinburgh; the Rev. R. D. Wilson, of Birmingham; the Rev. J. P. Chown, of Bradford; and the Rev. W. Hill, of Calcutta.

COLONIAL, CONTINENTAL, AND OTHER MISSIONS.

With inconsiderable exceptions, the societies reported above are missions to the heathen. Those which we now proceed to notice are more or less of a mixed character, or for some specific missionary work abroad, other than that already referred to. The oldest of these associations was, until not very long ago, exclusively a colonial missionary society; but it has now enlarged its sphere of operations, and contemplates the yet wider extension of its agency. We refer to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, which has celebrated its 161st anniversary under the presidency (in the unavoidable absence of the Primate) of the Bishop of Lichfield. The right reverend prelate adverted to the origin of the Society, which was owing to an interesting fact: a hundred and sixty years ago some four or five laymen, who shone as lights in the general darkness, and were far above the age in which they lived, met to see what could be done to provide for the spiritual wants of our American colonists, whom this country had sent out in its wisdom, forgetting to provide for them a church. They founded the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. In the report a fact similar to that which we have noticed in the proceedings of the missionary societies proper was brought out—the tendency of the missions to become self-supporting. Ten years ago the two dioceses of Toronto and Ontario were subsidised by the Society to the amount of 5,000*l.* per annum. But the colonists now maintain their own clergy, without receiving any assistance from the Society, except in the case of one clergyman, who ministers among the Ojibwa and other Indians. From two other Canadian dioceses the Society has begun gradually, but systematically, to withdraw its support. The Society seems to be devoting the funds thus withdrawn from the colonists to missions among the heathen. Eighteen of its agents in the British settlements in South Africa labour among the Kafirs and Zulus, and it is preparing to send two bands of missionaries beyond the Orange River, and into Independent Kaffraria. It also contemplates a mission in Madagascar. To Borneo it sent out, a few months since, a band of five new missionaries, from which a new era of missionary progress in that island is anticipated. The adoption of the report was moved by the Bishop of St. Helena, who said that when he first went to St. Helena he found little to do; but he had not been long there when a vessel laden with slaves, captured by a British cruiser, was brought to St. Helena as the nearest port, and he and his clergy devoted themselves to teaching them the Word of Life, and ultimately they were baptized. And similar results took place with regard to the slaves brought to St. Helena from time to time. Sir Stafford Northcote, Earl Nelson, and the Bishops of Bangor and Frederickton, also took part in the proceedings.

The Colonial and Continental Church Society was presided over by Lord Henry Cholmondeley, in the unavoidable absence of the Marquis. Lord Henry stated, in his opening speech, that there was hardly any large colony of this empire in which agents of the Society were not to be found. The report gave details of the Society's operations in British North America, the West Indies, South Africa, India, and Australia. The agency employed is as follows: Clergymen, 94; catechists and masters, 108; female teachers, 56; total, 258. Under the head of "Special Missions," it was stated that the Society is resolved vigorously to press the work of its Protestant Mission to French Roman Catholics in Canada. The same remark applies to the mission to the fugitive slaves in Canada. From the statement respecting the continental operations, we learn that the Society supplies English chaplains for some fifty places on the Continent of Europe. This department is full of interest and importance; but it entails upon the committee a large amount of care and responsibility. The Society's claims were advocated by the Bishop of Nova Scotia, the Revs. Canon Miller, Prebendary Burgess, E. Forbes, of Paris, and J. C. Ryle, and by Major-General Lawrence. From the speeches of Mr. Burgess and Mr. Ryle we must quote briefly. The former, whom one of his reverend brethren had spoken of as "a sort of archbishop unattached, with a sort of roving commission on the Continent," thus gave his opinion as to what colonial chaplains had been, and what they might now be expected to be:—

He was sure he did not exaggerate when he said that, some years ago, at least half of the clergymen who officiated abroad could not have officiated in England, and he doubted very much if many of them could have shown their faces. . . . He hoped that, within a few years, there would not be a single clergyman officiating on the Continent whom they would not be glad to see officiating in a church in this country. He wanted to see clergymen on the Continent who would give the right hand of fellowship to the Evangelical pastors of the Reformed Church of France—men who would say to them, "It is true you differ from us in Church order, but we would rather have Evangelical truth without Church order than Church order without Evangelical truth; and therefore, if we see that you are determined, with us, to 'know nothing among men but Jesus Christ, and him crucified,' we will work with you, and will join you in endeavouring to make an impression on the mass of Popery and Infidelity around us."

Mr. Ryle said some plain things about the Bicentenary controversy:—

They were now called upon from two quarters to leave the position they occupied. "Go out," said the Tractarians, "you have no business in the Church of England." "Come out," said the Dissenters, "you have no business in such a Church." They did not mean to go out to please either the Tractarians or the Dissenters. If their opponents could not see that the principles which marked their preaching were those of the Articles of the Church of England, they pitied their understanding, but they were not going to yield to their demand. Let them not hold up truth with a timorous and paralysed hand. If others did not know what they believed, let them boldly say, "We believe such and such things to be true; we believe such and such things to be false; we believe such and such things to be needful to salvation; we believe such and such things not to be needful to the saving of man's soul." Having boldly hoisted the flag of the Reformers, the good old flag of Latimer and Ridley, let them take care never to strike that flag.

The meeting of the Christian Vernacular Education Society for India, the chairman of which was Sir John Logan, was addressed also by the Rev. J. C. Goodhart, Dr. G. H. Davis, J. C. Colquhoun, Esq., the Rev. J. Leighton, and Col. R. S. Simpson. The committee reported an upward progress of the Society, "both steady and sure"—one indication of this being a great increase of annual subscribers. In the school department, the first efforts have been directed to the improvement of mission vernacular teachers, who numbered about 250 at the close of 1860. In the publication department, an issue of Scripture maps in the vernaculars had taken place. The Society's lists now contain ninety-five publications, in thirteen languages. Besides school-books, they include illustrated monthly periodicals in eight languages, as well as works on the evidences of Christianity, commentaries on the Gospels, Bible Dictionaries, &c. Since the formation of the Society, 486,881 publications, containing 20,928,944 pages, have been printed. The Society has, in India, eighteen book depôts, from which 385,653 publications have been issued. Steps are now being taken to organise a system of book-hawking, by which the circulation of works published by the Society may be extended in a very effective manner. An important practical speech was made by Dr. Davis, from which we quote somewhat at length, both because the remarks themselves deserve attention, and on account of the precedent thus set of saying other than merely agreeable things, at an annual meeting, when that course seems necessary. The societies generally will be no losers by the greatest freedom being conceded to all. Dr. Davis, in seconding the adoption of the report, remarked:—

I must be permitted to say that I should have done so with still more pleasure, if it had told us more of real bona fide educational work, because I firmly believe that the one want of India at the present day is education. Some short time ago I had occasion to write to all the book societies throughout India to inquire on what appeared to me to be a startling fact, and that was that there were no more than about nine millions of religious publications circulated throughout the whole of the 150,000,000 of India in twelve years. The principal reason of this is the want of education. Not more than about 2½ per cent. of the population of India can read. Can we wonder that the circulation of religious books has not been larger? On the contrary, should we not wonder that it has been so large? What is being done to meet this state of things? You have heard that there are thirty millions of children in India of an age to be at school, and to instruct these thirty millions of children we have in the first place our missionaries, and we must admit that they are doing more than could have been anticipated, when we consider the means at their disposal. [He enumerated the various mission schools in India, and gave statistics, showing that no more than about 100,000 children are under Christian education in India.] It is very sad to look upon the immense disproportion between the numbers receiving Christian education and the numbers capable of receiving it, and yet it is a satisfaction to all these societies to know there are so many of the lambs of Christ's flock who are being taught to know the great Shepherd of the sheep through their instrumentality. Then what has been done by the Government? From accurate information which I have received here from the India House, the statistics of education are these: [The Doctor quoted these statistics in detail, which showed a grand total of 4,158 schools and colleges, and 127,513 scholars. He then went on to say:] Why, it is absolutely nothing; it is a mere drop in the vast ocean of Indian humanity! Now I do not suppose for one moment that the Vernacular Society has to do all this work of educating the children of India. I do not suppose that any society, however large, could undertake such a mighty task. I believe that it can be done only by the Government of the country, which ought to give the highest and the best education to these children, and that is, not a secular, but a Christian education. But if the Government will not give the Christian element, at all events let us urge upon it to give secular education; for, whatever may be the immediate results, it is utterly impossible, if the education of any people be continued for any length of time, that that people will continue to be sceptical. What are we doing to meet this great want? As yet we have but one training-school; but if we are to do anything with this vast population, we must have training-schools in all parts of India. [Dr. Davis also suggested that, considering the great work the Society had undertaken in India, it ought as far as possible to confine itself to that work, and leave to others the work that properly belongs to them. He added:] India is different now from what it was a few years ago. It is now part of our social body. It is to the hand what the arm is to the body.

If we do not Christianise India, India may scepticise us. I hold in my hand a volume, of which, perhaps, there are very few in this country, but I am sorry to say there are many in India, and I find in this volume a series of tracts prepared for Young Bengal and for Young England, if she mixes with Young Bengal, in which there is an attempt to sustain eloquently and logically every one of those principles which are endeavoured to be inculcated here in your "Essays and Reviews." Believe me that our people cannot resist the influences to which they will be exposed there except by the special grace of God. We must therefore endeavour to seize hold of the young of India, as well as to preach to the adult generation.

Mr. J. C. Colquhoun, speaking in the name of the committee, thanked Dr. Davis for his friendly admonition, but denied that India was so bad as the Doctor had painted it. The Rev. J. Leighton also thought that that gentleman had drawn too gloomy a picture. There were many more readers in India than most people would expect to find. He had been delighted at finding his cook-boy reading a Persian poet.

The London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews—which assembled under the presidency of Lord Shaftesbury—reported that its mission work goes on steadily. The number of Jews baptized in direct communication with the Society, or which had reached the ears of the missionaries, amounted to upwards of 100. There was an immense disproportion between the inquirers and baptized, owing to the overwhelming difficulties and often deep affliction involved in the profession by an Israelite of the faith of the Nazarene. The speakers were Lord Radstock, the Revs. E. Garbett, and A. M. Myers, E. Beale, Esq., and the Revs. A. Stern and Dr. Ewald. The Earl of Shaftesbury, who occupied the chair.

read a letter from Jerusalem, which stated that the Prince of Wales had visited the hospital there, had made many inquiries respecting the Jews, and had presented a donation towards its support, as he had also done to the Bishop's schools and other institutions. Referring to the speech of Mr. Stern, who has visited, and is again about to visit, Abyssinia as a missionary, and whose statements respecting the prospects of Christianity in that country were of a highly-encouraging nature, the noble Chairman said:—

When I consider the state of things in Abyssinia, when I think of the opening that God has made for us, and of the opportunities which are now afforded . . . I declare to you that if I was not so advanced in life as I am, I should almost be tempted myself to take orders and go out as a missionary to the Jews in Abyssinia. My friend, Mr. Stern, has so warmed my heart, as he always does when he speaks on this subject, that I would, if I were not so old, go out and join him in this great and holy work; for I believe that no part of the Lord's vineyard was ever more ready for the harvest than is this. My friend has shown you, that here in Africa we might, by the blessing of God, have hundreds and thousands of immortal beings thirsting for the truth brought to the knowledge of the everlasting Gospel of Christ Jesus. He tells you that there are thousands of Jews, who, since the dispersion of the race, from the time of Nebuchadnezzar down to the present, have never been brought into Christianity of any kind, who have never been persecuted or oppressed, never insulted, never reviled by Christian persecutors, who have no antipathy to Christianity whatever, but who are in every way worthy to receive it, being, in fact, as anxious to receive it as we could be to give it to them. And yet we, though they are crying aloud, "Come over to us and help us, or we perish," are holding back from them.

The Turkish Missions' Aid Society meeting was presided over by Lord Shaftesbury. The report stated the grants to the American missionaries in Turkey amounted to 8,764*l*. The home operations involved expenses to the amount of 1,173*l*. The grants secured the support of fifty-six native preachers, school-teachers, and colporteurs, and fifty-two native students for the ministry, besides a continuation of native agency which the American board would have relinquished, on account of the civil war, but for the assistance of this Society, rendered by means of a special or "Crisis Fund." Dr. G. H. Davis, in moving the adoption of the report, enumerated the several points of interest presented by the Society. Interesting speeches were also delivered by the Rev. G.

Washbourn, American missionary from Constantinople, and the Rev. J. Ford, American missionary from Syria. Mr. Washbourn, who had administered the funds sent from the country, said that they were used for the evangelization of three different nationalities, speaking three different languages, and professing three different faiths; the Bulgarians, professing the faith of the Greek Church, the Armenians the faith of the Armenian Church, and the Mohammedans the faith of the empire. Speaking of the results of the labours of himself and his brethren, he said that, all things considered, they had had wonderful success, especially during the past year, in rendering the native churches self-supporting. Mr. Ford said:—

As regarded the present aspect of the missionary work in Syria, he would remark that God had, in His providence, graciously caused all the recent disturbances to favour the progress of Christianity. Even the Syrian massacres have been overruled to the furtherance of the cause of genuine Christianity. They had had two consequences. The immediate consequence was, of course, to break up the missionary stations and the schools, and to bring about a state of the greatest difficulty and danger. But then there came from this kingdom and other civilised countries relief for homeless thousands, and this had produced a powerful effect in more ways than one. Englishmen, and the religion of England, were in consequence spoken of with increased respect. Formerly it was customary among Orientals to say that the English had no religion; now the language used was very different, and when a native wanted to affirm anything strongly, he said, "I tell it you on the word of an Englishman." In all parts of Syria they found a wide field open for missionary labour.

The object of the Foreign-Aid Society is, as was well expressed by the Earl of Galloway, who presided at its annual meeting, not to undertake the work of evangelization itself, but to aid, countenance, and support the Protestant Churches of the Continent. The report, which was read by Prebendary Burgess, stated that the Society was acting in concert with the Evangelical Society of Geneva, the Evangelical Society of France, the Protestant Society for the Northern Provinces of France, the Central Protestant Society of Evangelization, the Evangelical Church of Lyons, the Evangelical Society of Belgium, the Waldensian Synod, the Italian Committee of Geneva, the Neapolitan Evangelical-Aid Society, and the Protestant Mission at Lisbon. The report took an extended view of the state of religion on the Continent, showing the need for the existence of such a body, and soliciting further aid from British Protestants. The funds for the year amounted to 2,419*l*. Among the speakers were J. C. Colquhoun, Esq.; Hon. A. Kinnaird, M.P., Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, who took an encouraging view of the state of religion on the Continent; Professor Revel, from Florence, who stated that the wondrous college there was supported by Baron Ricasoli; M. Bersier from the Evangelical Society of France, and several other foreign pastors.

The Evangelical Continental Society, the object of which is similar to that of the Foreign-Aid Society, but which differs from it in constitution, was presided over by S. Morley, Esq., and addressed by the Rev. F. Tucker, Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, M. de Pressensé, M. de Faye, of Lyons; the Hon. and Rev. B. W. Noel, M. Bersier, of Paris; and the Rev. Dr. Revel, of the Vaudois Church.

HOME MISSIONS.

The Church Pastoral-Aid Society reported, instead of a deficiency in the funds, as at the previous anniversary, a larger amount of income than on any former occasion. The amount of income now reported was 5,000*l*. over that of last year. The great privation and distress amongst the operative classes was referred to. The clergy generally expressed their belief that this trying period had been much blessed to the poor, who had exhibited a remarkable degree of patience. The grants of the Society secure the labours of 408 clergymen and 168 lay agents. Twenty more grants were reported this year than last. Forty-two of the grants are for new districts, whose aggregate population amounts to nearly 300,000. The Dean of Carlisle remarked that it was curious to see how the subject of money had been avoided at all the meetings, the reason being that this year the societies are all in a prosperous condition. The statements of the report as to the patience displayed by the distressed operatives in the north were confirmed by Canons Savage and Stowell. The latter remarked: "There is a moral magnificence in the bearing, the spirit, and the tone of the factory operatives of Lancashire that claims the esteem and admiration of the civilised world." He then related the following touching anecdote:—

In the outskirts of Manchester is a mill

where there was a large infusion of Christian influence from the Sunday-schools, parochial visitations, and similar instrumentalities. It was the painful duty of the millowner, some five or six weeks since, to announce to the hands that he found it absolutely impossible to continue to employ them, and that the factory must be closed from that day, for that he had no longer the means of paying them their wages. These poor people assembled, and received the painful intelligence with agitation marked upon their countenances—all except some thirty or forty, who received it calmly. At that moment, when all was silence, suspense, and dismay, a young woman, a Sunday-school teacher, struck up, with a calm, cheerful and encouraging voice, the beautiful hymn—

Ye fearful sinners, fresh courage take,
The clouds ye so much dread
Are big with mercy, and shall break
In blessings on your head.

Fifty or sixty voices took up the strain, and the hymn was sung by all the assembled hands.

"I do not hesitate to say," added Mr. Stowell, "that it was one of the most beautiful and touching manifestations of simple faith that has come within my knowledge and recollection." The meeting was also addressed by the Rev. G. Pettit, of Birmingham, and the Rev. C. Kemble, of Bath. The noble chairman concluded with an earnest and practical speech, which elicited loud applause. Among other topics, he referred to the Bicentenary controversy, and in allusion to what had fallen from some of the clerical speakers, observed:—

I am not going to allow the clergy of the Church of England to stand in the forefront of this battle; I am not going to let it be assumed that, in matters of this kind, they are the only persons to be shot at, or to take offence. (Hear, hear.) I maintain that this is the cause of the laity, just as much as it is the cause of the clergy. (Hear, hear.) Why, if the clergy have been guilty of perjury, I, in supporting the clergy, have been guilty of subornation of perjury. (Hear, hear.) I, too, have signed the Articles; I, too, am a subscriber to what is contained in the Prayer-book, just as much as the clergy are subscribers to it; I do, as a layman, everything that the clergy do, with the exception of the administration of the sacraments, and I take my full share of responsibility along with them. . . . I speak of the great body of the religious Nonconformists of this country with deserved respect and affection; and I am happy to say that I number among them some of my best friends. I gladly bear testimony to the good which they have done and are still doing, in advancing the cause of true religion, and to the good also which they have done to the Church of England; for I believe nothing does either a Church or an individual so much good as to be constantly looked up—to be kept in a constant state of responsibility.

The Additional Curates' Society, though it enjoys high patronage, is one of the few associations whose funds show a decrease during the past year. The falling off was upwards of 4,000*l.*, as compared with the previous year's report. The anniversary commenced with the celebration of the communion at St. Matthew's, Spring-gardens; a public meeting at Willis's Rooms followed; and the day's proceedings terminated with a soirée in the same place, at which Vice-Chancellor Wood presided. The Chairman at the public meeting was the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the claims of the Society were advocated by the Earl of Shaftesbury, Canon Wordsworth, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Dr. Baylee, and the Earl of Dartmouth. Canon Wordsworth suggested to his clerical brethren the adoption of the offertory, and in proof of what might be effected by it, advanced the case of Kidderminster, "where the offertory in three churches—not from the sovereigns of the rich, but from the pennies of the poor—had amounted to 900*l.*" The venerated Primate, after speaking of the aid afforded by the Society to "faithful clergymen," added, parenthetically, "and, thank God, I may use the term 'faithful' whenever I speak of clergymen in the present day." Mr. Gladstone followed up the remark, and observed:—

I may say there never was a time in our history when witness more valuable was borne to the labours of the clergy—when the clergy were more generally esteemed, and esteemed not only by their flocks, but by the world at large; and never was there a period in our history when that esteem was better deserved. If I may take you back to times now distant, when, not in contravention to the rest of the country, but going with its feelings, the clergy partook of spiritual torpor, those times have passed away; and it may be said that if improvement has taken place—as, thank God, it has—in the religious condition of that important class, the laity, that improvement is the more conspicuous, for it is attributable to the moral training of the clergy. There may not be many here present who lived in the agonising times of the French Revolution, but I cannot forbear quoting the testimony of two persons of great eminence and high authority. The first of these is an ecclesiastic, your grace's venerated predecessor; the other is the late Mr. Grenville, a politician, somewhat his superior in years—a man most competent to give an opinion on such a subject, and an acute observer of events—and from both these eminent men I heard that of all the changes they had seen in the course of their lives, remembering as they did—especially as the latter did—all the changes that had taken place, none was so remarkable as the wonderful change in the character of the English clergy; and I believe that the testimony which they thus bore might be continued and extended during every subsequent year.

Mr. Gladstone admitted that the influence which the clergy possessed over the laity in times past is not now to be looked for:—

Social work has modified these relations, but the most marked and distinctive character of the Church is its adaptation to the wants of all times. If your grace will permit me, I will quote—although I am sure I shall not do it justice—a sentiment of yours in one of your earlier works, wherein you deal with the receipt of Christianity by various classes of mind, and say, "Philosophy has not found it too simple, nor simplicity too learned." I believe in those few words is conveyed the expression of a profound and far-reaching truth—that the wants of Christianity may vary in ages or countries, but that it will be equal to the work until it shall accomplish the ingathering of the redeemed. In the district which I visited last week it was impossible not to see, with all the distress which exists, that there is a spirit of self-reliance, the most noble and the most honourable which ever marked a great people—which tells us that the principle to look to no man for support is the principle which has grown and will grow amongst the best masses of the people; and your grace's experience will tell you that when a clergyman goes to his Lancashire flock they will give little on trust; but if he be found what they want, then will he have no more true and faithful followers. The relations between the clergy and the population is not, as I have said, such as has obtained in former times, but I say also there is no shade of opinion to which a useful and intelligent ministry may not be adapted.

The meeting of the Church of England Scripture Readers' Association was presided over by the Bishop of Bangor. It appeared from the report that an increasing number of readers are employed, owing not only to an increase of funds, but to the fact that, of late, qualified men have presented themselves in abundance. The Rev. A. W. Thorold, Rector of St. Giles's, who moved the adoption of the report, in course of a sensible speech observed that:—

A great deal had been said about feeble and inconclusive and unsatisfactory preaching. Many men said that they wished for more solid instruction than they were in the habit of receiving, and desired to have the Gospel more brought out, and vindicated, and explained. He thanked God that this righteous and rational desire for scriptural, and effective, and solid teaching existed. It was one of the best signs of the times which showed that men were studying the Bible for themselves, so long as it was instruction they wished for, and not mere amusement, so long as they wanted to be made better, and not merely amused; the more there was of a righteous cry like that, the better it would be for the Church of God. But let them be just. They were right in asking for good sermons, but they ought to give the clergy the chance of making good sermons. If they were to go running about the streets hunting up the sick, if they were never to have an hour to themselves, they could never be expected to preach as they might wish to do, and it was no fault of theirs. It was in this way that this Association assisted the clergy in enabling them to prepare their sermons, and it was a benefit to the higher and middle, as well as the lower classes.

A number of instances in which the simple reading of the Word of God had produced a most wonderful effect on the minds of men, in restraining their evil passions, were mentioned by the Rev. L. Tugwell, who also stated that in some places into which a policeman was almost afraid to venture the Scripture-readers were treated with the utmost courtesy and kindness. The Rev. William McCall, incumbent of a parish in the east of London, mentioned, as one of the results which have been effected in that district, that within the last two months he had been engaged as a secretary of a committee in procuring signatures to memorials to different railway companies, requesting them to discontinue the running of excursion trains on Sundays, and he was happy to say the two larger companies had acceded to the request. But the point to which he wished particularly to call the attention of the meeting was this—that for one sheet signed by members of congregations, two were signed by working men. Lord Ebury, the Earl of Effingham, and the Rev. R. H. Baynes also took part in this meeting.

The London City Mission was presided over at its anniversary meeting by Mr. Joseph Hoare, who delivered an excellent and spirit-stirring speech at the opening. The report was very cheering. More hours have been spent in domiciliary visitation by the missionaries, more visits paid, more calls upon the sick and dying, than in any former year. The society is better appreciated too; the subscriptions have increased in proportion to the work done, and the results altogether are of a most cheering character. The Hon. Arthur Kinnaird, M.P.; Lord Charles Russell, the Sergeant-at-Arms to the House of Commons; the Rev. Mr. Chalmers, of the Presbyterian Church; Rev. Mr. Kemble, Incumbent of Bath; and Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel (Baptist), were among the speakers; and each of them had some tale to tell of the good done by the agents of the society.

The receipts of the Irish Church Missions to the Roman Catholics were nearly 4,000*l.* over those of the previous year. The total number of agents—clergy, Scripture-readers, and others—is 475. The operations of the missions have secured a very considerable advance in the permanent work of the Reformation in some parts of Ireland. This was shown by a striking fact:—

Two of the society's officers, who were at the Evangelical Conference at Geneva, in September, 1861, were charged at that Conference with a commission to convey to the persecuted Christians in Spain a letter of sympathy and love. This they effected, and were enabled to have a long and interesting conference with three of the Spanish Protestants confined in the common prison at Granada. On their return home they communicated the facts to large gatherings of persons in Dublin, in Tuam, in Galway, in Clifden, and in some other missionary districts. It was proposed that an address of sympathy should be drawn up, expressing the feelings of persons, who, having been Roman Catholics, like these Spanish prisoners, had, like them, renounced the communion of the Church of Rome, without having incurred the penalties and sufferings which their fellow-converts in Spain were enduring. This address received 1,867 signatures, and was sent to the prisoners at Granada. A reply was received from Manuel Matamoros, which breathes the spirit of the martyrs of the sixth century, and is replete with marks of the teaching of the Holy Ghost. It has been printed and circulated in all the missionary districts. This circumstance has produced an incidental testimony, that in the missionary districts, without including Dublin, 1,867 converts, above the age of fourteen years, have voluntarily and readily come forward to proclaim themselves such.

The chairman of the meeting was J. C. Colquhoun, Esq., and the Rev. Dr. M'Neile and the Bishops of Ripon and Winchester were among the speakers.

At the anniversary of the Religious Tract Society Lord Radstock was the chairman. The report showed that during the year the publications issued from the Society's depôt amounted to 41,661,097. If to these were added the probable circulation from foreign depôts, the number reached 47,000,000, making a total, since the institution of the Society, of 959,000,000. The number of new works (including tracts) published during the year was 814. The total amount of grants had been 13,574.; and of benevolent receipts, including legacies, 12,770*l*. The adoption of the report was moved by the Rev. F. Tucker, and seconded by the Rev. Canon Stowell. The misapprehension to which we have referred as having seemed for a moment to threaten the Bible Society, and being now fairly past, was referred to in such a way as only to impart to the principal speeches at this meeting a point, animation, and earnestness of which the audience gave the most unmistakable evidence of their hearty appreciation. Mr. Stowell said:—

When I think how this Society has pursued its onward course through waves and storms, in times of great controversy and bitterness, when Christians without its walls were sorely rent and divided, still holding on its straightforward course, neither borne to the right hand nor to the left, I can only say that I regard this as one of the evidences that God has taken it under His special care. God has blessed it, and He will continue to bless it. So long as it simply maintains that to which it is pledged, so long as it maintains, without partiality or prejudice, the great fundamental principles on which it was founded, I for one, whoever else may do so, will not leave it. Nor will any controversy, nor any spirit of party, nor any sad tumults distracting the Christian Church, lead me to waver for a moment, or hesitate to pursue the course which I have done in cleaving to the Bible Society and the Tract Society, both of which are the peculiar property of none of us, but the common inheritance of all.

The reverend gentleman was loudly cheered. The other speakers were the Rev. Dr. Tidman, the Rev. Mr. Leighton, secretary to the Tract Society of Northern India, and the Rev. J. B. Owen.

HOME EDUCATIONAL SOCIETIES.

We commence our account of this group of societies with the Ragged School Union, both on account of the pure philanthropy of its object and the interest of its annual meeting. It was the eighteenth anniversary, and for the eighteenth time the Earl of Shaftesbury occupied the chair. Here are a few facts from the report:—

In union with the society there were 201 Sunday-schools with 25,000 scholars; 172 day-schools with above 18,000 scholars; 211 evening-schools with above 9,000 scholars. The above was the average number in attendance, the number on the books being much larger. Increasing efforts were made to keep to the right class, and therefore the numbers were kept within bounds. The industrial scholars were, this year, 3,600; the voluntary teachers, 2,800; the paid monitors, 420; the paid teachers, 317. The number who regularly attended the Parents' Meetings was 2,850; while those who attended other religious services held in ragged-schools by the teachers, City missionaries, and others, amounted to above 5,000. All these were the average numbers and attendance throughout the year. The number reported as sent to situations from the various ragged-schools during the year is 1,930; the number rewarded at the last prize meeting was 960. All these had certificates of good conduct from their employers for twelve months at least. Among the scholars there were now 170 who had become communicants at various Christian Churches, and among the voluntary teachers 150 who were formerly scholars in the ragged school. The shoe-blacks were, on the whole, getting a fair living, some of them being really well off. The united earnings of 362 lads in the year were 4,665*l*. As the Shoe-black Brigade was a healthy offshoot from ragged-schools, so the committee trusted the Rag Brigade would also prove to be. This was a society just set on foot to collect rags of all kinds, waste paper, bones, &c., throughout London, from large houses of business, but especially from private families, and seemed likely to be successful. In several localities great assistance continues to be received from City missionaries and Scripture-readers in this department of ragged-school work. The penny banks, clothing clubs, and provident funds, continued to prosper. Eighty-six penny banks collected 8,520*l*. during the year, and fifty-four clothing clubs collected above 900*l*.

There is an eloquence in these figures for those who can fully understand their significance which might well kindle into its brightest glow the heart-stirring oratory of the noble president. After an allusion to the report of the Education Commissioners, and to the proof afforded, by what has lately occurred, that he had given sound advice in recommending the conductors of ragged-schools not to accept grants from the Privy Council, the earl went on to say:—

Shall any one tell me that efforts of this kind can be made without wonderful results being achieved? Aye, let any one who knew this city some fifteen or twenty years ago, go into those same former haunts, those same former recesses, those same former dens of wretchedness and infamy, and let him observe the mighty change which has been wrought on the surface of society. I am not saying—I am not so foolish as to say—that we have attained everything we desired; I am not so foolish as to say that there is not still an amount of crime and sorrow and misery, and intemperance and vice, which ought to put to shame a Protestant country and all the members of Christian churches; but, then, at the same time, I rejoice to say that things are not so bad as they were.

If, however, God had not put it into the hearts of men at that early period to come forward, like a band of missionaries to invade the stronghold of vice and of the devil, the condition of this metropolis would have been so appalling, that we should not perhaps have been able to meet in this room as we are doing without disturbance and violence. The condition of things would, I believe, then have been such that combination for religious purposes would have been almost impossible. If you go among the people who have been benefited by our efforts, they will tell you what have been the results of our labours as respects them. They will tell you that in their opinion all these agencies are founded on true principles, and directed to the best ends. These agencies have, then, I say, produced great results already; but I believe that, under the blessing of God, they will produce far greater results before ten years shall have passed over our heads. Ay, but in order to effect that, we must have a combination of all those who desire the advancement of religion and of all who have the means of assisting in this great work. (Hear, hear.) Whether we belong to the Church of England, or whether we belong to some one of the great bodies of Nonconformists holding Evangelical truth, all who care for the advancement of Christ's kingdom, to whatever Church they may belong, must join together heart and hand, body and soul, for the purpose of bringing to completion this great, this mighty undertaking.

Teachers are wanted, and his lordship enforced upon his audience the necessity of the want being supplied.

The adoption of the report was moved by the Rev. E. Bayley, Rector of Bloomsbury, and seconded by the Rev. Newman Hall. The other speakers were Lord Stratford de Redcliffe; the Rev. Mr. Chown, of Bradford; J. Payne, Esq., Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, and the Rev. Mr. Cuthbertson, of Australia. Dr. Merle, in concluding his speech, remarked that there was no Englishman whom the Christian brethren on the Continent more loved and respected than Lord Shaftesbury; and that the late King of Prussia expressed to him the same sentiments.

At the Sunday School Union meeting the Hon. A. Kinnaird occupied the chair. The report stated that the committee have organised a Training College for Sunday-school Teachers, established upon the system of evening classes. An effort is about to be made to introduce similar plans for the benefit of teachers amongst the schools connected with the American Methodist Episcopal Church, which comprise 826,239 scholars, and report no less than 17,498 conversions of scholars as having taken place during the year. The number of Sunday-schools in the metropolis (including all, whether connected with the union or not) is ascertained to be: Schools, 893; teachers, 17,039, scholars, 190,079. It is proposed to hold a Sunday-school convention in September next. The Revs. Dr. Spence, F. Tucker, F. Greeves, Messrs. Reed, Penrose, and the Rev. Foster Rogers, took part in the proceedings.

The British and Foreign School Society was presided over by Earl Russell. The Society's operations include the training of teachers, the maintenance of the model schools for boys and girls in the Borough-road and at Stockwell, the inspection of schools in London and the country, as well as an extensive correspondence abroad; aid is also rendered by grants of school materials to poor schools at home and in the colonies. In the training department there are 95 young men and 100 young women in course of preparation for elementary schools. Seven inspectors are employed, covering the whole of the country. The number of schools inspected is 1,157. This is exclusive of the metropolis and its vicinity, where schools attended by more than 30,000 children have been visited. The contemplated alterations at the Borough-road, and the buildings at Stockwell, are completed at a cost of 24,000*l.* Earl Russell, in his opening speech, gave a sketch of the progress of education, especially in connexion with the system of grants by the Committee of Council. He also criticised freely certain parts of the report of the Education Commission. The instruction is superior now to what it was when Earl Russell began his career as an education reformer; and after it was admitted that the poor should be taught, it was the special care of some patrons of education that they should not be taught too much. "To show you the state of opinion which prevailed upon this point," said the earl, "I will mention to you that a bishop of the Church stated that there was no use in teaching children geography, unless it was the geography of the Holy Land. As I wish to be impartial, I may add that the schoolmaster of this very school told me that an eminent Dissenter came here one day and objected to the children being taught geography at all." Resolutions were moved and seconded by the Rev. Henry Allon, Mr. Bruce, M.P., Lord Lyveden, Sir Walter Stirling, the Rev. F. Tucker, and Mr. Marshall, from Liberia. By one of the resolutions Earl Russell was appointed to succeed the late Duke of Bedford, as President of the Society.

Thoughts on Revelation, with Special Reference to the Present Time. By JOHN McLEOD CAMPBELL, Author of "The Nature of the Atonement, and its Relation to the Remission of Sins and Eternal Life." Cambridge: McMillan and Co., and Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London.

THESE "Thoughts on Revelation" are suggestive to the thoughtful, and also characterised by soundness and faithfulness. The self-evidencing light of Revelation, analogously to the self-evidencing disclosures of creation, showing forth the glory of God, is very happily treated; and the faith which receives the kingdom of God as a little child, on God's own Word, deeply contrasted with the implicit (counterfeit) faith of the Church of Rome. So in answer to the charge of the infidel, that our faith is traditional, like that of the Romanist, it is well replied that we have an antecedent right to expect a revelation, and that when we have received that revelation, we find that it does self-evidently testify of God as our Father. The observations on the subject of toleration and religious liberty are worthy of note; and so is the distinction between the inspiration of revelation in the Apostles and the ordinary working of the Divine life in them as believers. It is too much the habit to confound these together; and thus the proper standard of individual faith, experience, and assurance is too much lowered, owing to that of the Apostles being often supposed exclusively theirs, or miraculous. Our space will not permit us to notice other interesting topics in this book.

Nichol's Series of Standard Divines. Puritan Period. The Works of THOMAS ADAMS. Vol. II. and III. Sermons and Treatises by SAMUEL WARD, B.D. Edinburgh: James Nichol.

THE second of these volumes, which completes the issue of Adams's Practical Works, contains also such of the writings of Samuel Ward as seem to demand republication. Included in this volume are the memoirs of these divines—Adams being sketched by Dr. Angus, and Ward by the Rev. J. C. Ryle. As a Suffolk clergyman, Mr. Ryle has done his best to obtain all available information about Samuel Ward, who for thirty years filled an Ipswich pulpit, and probably is less satisfied with the result than his readers are likely to be, who will not, in this case, desiderate a lengthy memoir. Dr. Angus also finds little more than the shadow of a great name, as he tries to show us Thomas Adams. In the absence of the man, we must be content with the author and preacher; and, after stating all that is known of his personal history, Dr. Angus has left nothing undone in his endeavours to delineate both. As to the general merits of this series of Standard Divines we spoke in our January number, and can only here renew our expression of approval. We must not omit again to refer to the cheapness of the issue, which even in a day of cheap books is noticeable. The general index and the index of texts to Adams are copious, appear to have been carefully prepared, and add greatly to the value of this edition of his works.

The Sanctuary at Home; or, Lord's-day Services and Sermons for Christian Invalids, Mothers, Emigrants, Soldiers, Sailors, or others Detained from the House of God. By the Rev. R. DICK DUNCAN, Minister of the Union Church, Broad-street, Edinburgh, Author of "Creation," "The Eldership," "Popery," &c. Edinburgh: William Oliphant and Co. London: Hamilton, Adams and Co.

THE preface, as well as the title-page, informs us for whose use this volume has been compiled; but while it may be a grateful help to many "a child of God detained from the public sanctuary," we presume it is rather over the heads of "soldiers, sailors," and others, except exceptionally. The idea is to us somewhat novel. After the example of "The Book of Common Prayer," the exact formula of this private worship, from beginning to end, has first been given; then a sermon; also, as we are told, without any tinge whatever of "denominationalism," the services of Baptism and the Lord's Supper have been introduced. Six Lord's-days have been thus provided for; and six additional sermons, for variety or for private use. The volume breathes a rich Evangelical spirit, and is calculated to edify. It is also well printed and neatly executed, and we desire its success.

The Great Exodus; or, the Time of the End. How near are we to it? By the Rev. J. A. WYLIE, LL.D., Professor in the Protestant Institute of Scotland. Nisbet and Co.

Books on prophecy seem sure to be read at the present time. Whether this be a symptom of a real near approach to the time of the end, or only of a certain peculiar condition of the general mind, is a question on which doctors will differ. In our judgment, the symptom is not a sign of very sound religious health; more especially when "sensation" titles and marvellous anticipations form so large a portion of the staple commodity now generally brought out. Dr. Wylie is well known as a very able writer on subjects connected especially with the Roman Papacy. His clearness of view and vigour of pen could not fail to produce an interesting and readable volume; and though we do not adopt his opinions in many important respects, we are able to go along with and consider his reasonings, without the impression which certain other publications in this line excite—viz., that we are merely perusing a got-up piece of saleable religious romance.

Heart Religion; or, Living Belief of the Truth. By the Rev. ALEXANDER LEITCH. Nisbet and Co.

WE have read this book with no ordinary satisfaction and profit. Mr. Leitch is already known to thinkers by previous works, which prove him to be a man of great originality and vigour of mind. His reputation will not only be upheld, but advanced, by this very able and important contribution to the department of practical divinity. In no branch of theology is our literature lower at the present day. There is no lack, indeed, of books of a practical sort, many of which are excellent and useful; but the great majority of them are so superficial, and so sentimental, that the writers learn to regard and treat their readers as if they were babes in intellect, to be fed only with milk, and not with strong meat. Such productions may benefit those already convinced, and easily moved to good; but the doubting, the hard-headed, the unconverted, too often turn away from them as beneath their notice. They demand something that will commend itself to their reason and satisfy their minds. At the same time, mere controversial works, that address themselves to the understanding, are not the most profitable for such persons. The mind may be convinced, while the heart remains unmoved. What is needed is, that principles and practice be presented in their close connexion, and the religion of the heart enforced, as the only proper end and completion of intellectual conviction.

This is the worthy work which Mr. Leitch has attempted, and which he has executed in a masterly manner. He goes at once to the root of the matter. He takes for granted nothing but principles which are founded in human nature, and which must be admitted by all who will give themselves, as they ought, to reflection. Setting out from these, he moves onward, step by step, with resistless logic, sweeping away a thousand sophisms and godless excuses by the simple directness of his course, and arriving at the conclusion that the adoption of the religion of Jesus, the acceptance of His offers of mercy, and submission to His authority, is the only conduct worthy of rational and reasonable beings. Reasoning from undeniable premises, he demonstrates the necessity of honestly acting according to every dictate of conscience, and every item of truth believed, to be the only road to happiness; and on the other hand, the criminality and danger of doing otherwise. He proves that there is no religion worthy of the name but that of conscience, and that, when attentively listened to and sincerely followed, obedience to conscience can terminate in nothing short of the true worship and love of God. All this the author does in a clear and vigorous style, in a strain of manly piety, with a depth of thought and force of argument, with a freshness of illustration and directness of application, well fitted to arrest the thoughtful, startle the doubting, and convict the careless; to stimulate the mind, rouse the conscience, and stir the heart.

We should have liked to give some extracts in illustration of the spirit and style of the book, and in support of the hearty commendation of it we have felt bound to express; but, in the hope that many will be tempted to turn to the work itself, we shall content ourselves with quoting a paragraph specially suited to the pages of Evangelical Christendom. The author has been urging (as he does throughout the volume) the necessity of thorough honesty in the search after truth as the imperative duty of every man. To a want of this, in a greater or less degree, he attributes the unseemly differences existing between Evangelical Churches, and thus he writes:—

If, as Christians, we would make short work with Infidelity, and if, as Protestants, we would hasten the full and final overthrow of Popery, let us begin with the Romanism and freethinking of our Evangelical Churches, and of ourselves individually. When we adhere to any sect, without proving all things, and holding fast only that which is good, we are committing the very fault which we condemn as the support of Popery, and as the source of Infidelity. If we can find one truth in Scripture, and agree in holding it, there is no sufficient reason to justify us in contradicting one another as to any scriptural truth.

whatever. Were there one denomination which, in its terms of communion, neither takes from nor adds to the contents of God's own wondrous Book, separation from that Christian society would, unquestionably, be schism in its scriptural and malignant sense. If there be not one of us who is prepared to claim this faultlessness for his own religious connexion, then no more evidence is needed to convict us of departure from the will of God. So far as we are right-hearted in our Master's service we shall feel stimulated, by the most powerful motives, to seek to approach nearer and nearer in sentiment to our Christian brethren in other denominations; not by forgetting or ignoring our common differences, but by endeavouring a reconciliation of those conflicting views by which we are severed into antagonistic parties. Our divisions and controversies on momentous topics are the weakness and opprobrium of the Protestant Evangelistic cause. Little wonder that it should be so, if their existence betray, as we have seen it does, the powerful operation in the midst of us of Popish and Infidel principles. We have been buckling on our armour to fight and overthrow the Church of Rome. But there is not, perhaps, a single Protestant denomination in Christendom that is not contending for some point as of Divine authority, and in the name of the Bible, which yet the Bible does not sanction. Is it any matter of surprise, then, that our counsels should be often disconcerted and our assaults repelled, when we ourselves are found sometimes to be building, not avowedly, but thoughtlessly, on the very same foundation on which Rome has erected her monstrous superstructure. We have been entering the lists with Infidelity, and sometimes feel regret that the warfare is so long protracted, and the struggle so severe. But the truth is, the severity of the struggle is caused more by the extent of freethinking which is within our ranks than by the strength of that which is openly opposed to us. If there be a Scripture truth embraced and upheld by our brother-believer, or sister denomination, and if we shall set ourselves to resist and counterwork it, then are we most surely subtracting from the pages of inspiration as really as Payne or Strauss ever did.

Is the Bible True? Seven Dialogues between James White and Edward Owen, concerning "Essays and Reviews." By the Author of "Essays on the Church." Seeley, Jackson and Halliday.

THESE dialogues are upon the Creation, Miracles, the Resurrection, Prophecy, Inspiration, Conscience, and one on General Results. They are characterised by the practical turn of the author of the well-known "Essays on the Church;" and contain a great deal of information in a short compass. The author does not pretend to originality in all his arguments, but very wisely, has not scrupled to gather them from every quarter. But he has used his gatherings well.

The Gardener's Daughter; or, Mind whom you Marry. By the Rev. C. G. ROWE. Partridge.

A VERY neatly-illustrated story-book, and with a good, practical, moral and religious tendency. But we have serious doubts whether it be lawful to introduce into fictitious works some of the solemn spiritual topics handled in this tale. The objections entertained by some persons against the lawfulness of any religious fiction go further than we might incline to go, but the subject requires great caution and judicious handling, lest the evil outweigh the good.

The Child of the Kingdom. By the Author of "The Way Home." London: Nisbet and Co.

A DELIGHTFUL little book for children, with suitable illustrations. Sure we are that it is just as easy to teach children truth and goodness in a way adapted to their infantile capacities and feelings as it is to amuse them with nonsense and grotesque absurdities.

TOPLADY OR CHARLES WESLEY?

We have received the following note:—

"The Parsonage, Streatham-common,
"May 3, 1862.

"Sir,—At page 267 of Evangelical Christendom for this month, in the brief criticism on Miss Whately's little book, 'The Story of Martin Luther,' that lady's assumption that C. Wesley was the author of the hymn—

'Christ whose glory fills the skies,' is denied, and the hymn is attributed by the reviewer to Toplady.

"Allow me to refer you to the late James Montgomery's 'Christian Psalmist,' in the valuable introductory essay of which collection, at page 27 (edition 3rd), you find these words: 'One of Charles Wesley's loveliest progeny has been fathered upon Augustus Toplady, "Christ whose glory," &c. To the best of my belief, Montgomery never altered that passage, and on all accounts, it would seem very likely, in the absence of positive evidence to the contrary, that he was right. I too only wish 'Sum cuique.'

"I remain, your obedient servant,
"STENTON EARDLEY,
"Incumbent of Immanuel Church."

In an edition of Toplady's works of the date of 1841, which is said to be reprinted verbatim from the original edition of 1794, we find this hymn as Toplady's. Perhaps some readers can throw light on this point, which is not without interest.

Monthly Retrospect.

HOME.

ON the first day of last month was opened the International Exhibition. The ceremonial was very imposing, though it was deprived of the splendour which the presence of the Queen would have shed on it: and, independent of her absence, the saddening recollections connected with the death of the Prince Consort, and all the hopes entwined with his patronage, that were dashed to the ground by that event, would intermingle with the pomp and exultation of the opening day. There were other recollections, also, of a chastening and sobering character. Those of our readers who remember the Exhibition of 1851 will readily recall the wild hopes that were then entertained of universal peace, happiness, and goodwill which that emporium of material wealth and taste was expected to inaugurate. In fact, it closed the era it was anticipated to open; and since then we have had an unbroken series of wars and convulsions. The opening of the present Exhibition is celebrated under far different auspices—our kinsmen across the Atlantic engaged in internecine slaughter, and the shadows of their fell rage resting with blighting effect on the industry of Europe, causing misery and want in many a dwelling in our manufacturing districts. There is surely enough in all this to humble human pride, to teach us that the products of genius, taste, and industry are the effects, and not the causes, of the regeneration of society, and to fill the inhabitants of this country with thankfulness that, in the midst of all the changes in other lands, and all the privations of our own people, we are still blessed with peace and tranquillity, and are able to celebrate this industrial festival without disturbance or fear of tumult.

The May Meetings have been scenes of extraordinary interest. Through the gloom of our social condition the splendour of our spiritual successes glows with unusual brightness. In despite of the partial paralysis which has fallen upon our commerce and trade, the funds of the different philanthropic and religious societies have experienced no decline—nay, we find one after another reporting that the ordinary subscriptions have reached a higher point in the present year than they ever did before. Nor is this all; their material success of this kind would be of little worth; but the charm of the meetings lay in this, that while Christians had thus in some measure been doing their part, God has, according to His promise, been meeting them more than half-way—showering upon their labours a blessing and a success ten times more rich and full than their highest efforts would amount to. Everywhere we hear of doors of usefulness opening, of races and nations becoming accessible, of native pastors being reared up, and an indigenous Christianity created in these heathen lands; and what is not the least blessed result, none of the societies have to deplore the loss of any man of mark among their missionaries. A necessarily condensed account of these meetings will be found in another page; and we believe the impression produced on reading them will be best embodied in the words of our Saviour—“the fields are whitening to the harvest.”

It was feared that the unfortunate Bicentenary controversy would have an injurious effect on the harmony and peace of our religious anniversaries. We are glad to observe that this fear was groundless. Where the matter was alluded to at all, it was in the spirit and with the resolution that temporary questions like these shall not be allowed to disturb that deep Christian unity which underlies all mere superficial disputings. At the same time, we do not the less deprecate its occurrence, as tending to run into imputations on personal honesty, which in all cases are to be condemned. On this subject a correspondence of some interest has been published which took place between Sir Culling Eardley and Sir Morton Peto. The latter baronet has taken part in the controversy; the former has concerned himself with it only in so far as the great question of Christian union may be affected by it; but in the minds of both there was the same feeling, that whatever may be thought of subscription to the formularies of the Church, one man's opinions are not to be made the standard of another man's conscience. We heartily wish our controversialists on both sides would keep that truth more prominently in view.

Among the numerous religious meetings which were held in the course of last month there was one in Scotland which is remarkable enough to deserve separate notice. In the days of the Stuarts the more stern Presbyterians insisted that the King should take the Covenant as a condition of their tendering him allegiance as his subjects. It is well known that a portion of them refused submission to William III. on that very ground, though the sagacious monarch, wiser than his predecessors, prudently winked at their refusal. It would hardly be believed, however, that their descendants were seriously discussing last month whether they ought not, in conformity with their standards, to exercise discipline on any member of their Church that took the oath of allegiance to Queen Victoria, and exercised the elective franchise. We are happy to state that the Synod came to a rational conclusion—they decided, by a large majority, that this was no point of faith, and every voter ought to be left to his own liberty in the matter.

The distress to which we alluded last month is still on an increase. It is general all over the manufacturing districts, though there are some towns that escape more lightly than others. Among those towns where the want of employment is most felt may be mentioned Preston, Blackburn, and Wigan. In each of these towns the unemployed operatives may be counted by thousands. It is gratifying to learn from all quarters the manly, uncomplaining, Christian patience with which these people bear their sufferings. There has not been the most remote approach to any outbreak or breach of the peace; in various instances where deputations from their number have waited on those in authority they stated that they knew perfectly well that no class of their fellow-countrymen was to blame for their sufferings; and all they want is that in the administration of that relief which their necessities constrain them to accept they may not be treated as common paupers; compelled to accept parish aid because they cannot get work, they are unwilling to be classed with those who might have work, but who will not accept it. A spirit like this is worth cultivating to the utmost; it is one of the most beautiful fruits that Christian influences elicit from its professors. It is fair to say, too, that the masters and landowners connected with the county are not wanting in their duty on occasion of this great calamity. Many of the millowners have undertaken to feed their hands for several months, with a view of keeping them together till better times shall come. At present they are almost unanimous against applying to the Treasury for a grant of money, and maintain that Lancashire has enough to feed its own population. We trust this short lesson of the mutual dependence on each other of masters and men will not be thrown away when the hour of prosperity comes round again.

FOREIGN.

Some time ago the French Government issued a decree, that the French Bishops should not attend the canonisation of the Japanese martyrs at Rome. The Bishops, we now learn, have, as a whole, disobeyed that injunction, and, in large numbers, have obeyed the call of the Pope. The Emperor has prudently chosen to overlook their disobedience to him; but it is not to be supposed that his goodwill towards them has been increased by their conduct. The impression that his troops are about to leave Rome is very general, though hitherto nothing has occurred to confirm the rumour. But that which Christians will turn to with as much interest is the progress of Evangelical truth in France itself. On this point we refer with great pleasure to the summary of the religious meetings contained in our correspondent's letter, as well as to that noble work for Christ, the opening of a new Protestant chapel in Paris, under the pastorate of the Rev. F. Monod.

The conduct of the Spanish Government towards Protestants is still one of painful hostility. There is no symptom of relaxation in the punishment of Matamoros and his companions; and we regret to find that the Epoca newspaper of Madrid contains what we suppose may be considered the official defence of the authorities for closing the doors of the Protestant services in Seville. According to this apologist, the Government was entitled to put down the meetings, because they were not held in the house of the Consul, but at the residence of a Protestant clergyman. Our Consul, who is a Roman Catholic, refused to interfere in one way or another; and the authorities therefore issued their prohibition. We are indebted to the Epoca for the information that these meetings were numerously attended, and this it was that excited the jealousy and indignation of the Romish clergy of the district.

From Turkey the mournful intelligence reaches us that a zealous American missionary, the Rev. Mr. Coffing, of Adana, has been murdered by some mountain robbers into whose hands he had fallen. This, together with the abandonment of a foreign mission in the South Seas, owing to the resistance of the heathen, shows us how chequered is the career of the Gospel, and how halting and lame, even at the most flourishing time, the Gospel of Christ makes progress in the world, in accordance with the first prophecy, that the heel of the woman's seed would be bruised in the conflict with the serpent.

The intelligence from America during the past month is painfully interesting. The conflict between the kindred races becomes more sanguinary as the war proceeds and the passions on each side become inflamed; but so far as the war itself is concerned, victory itself flows steadily on the side of the North. New Orleans has been taken possession of, and Norfolk, with its navy yard, and probably, by this time, Richmond. The whole seaboard and the sources of the great rivers are in the hands of the Federals, and it might seem as if the war were about to terminate. But on a closer look this impression vanishes.

There are still two large Confederate armies in the field; and while one of them eludes the grasp of General McClellan, in Virginia, the other, secured behind entrenchments, confronts General Halleck in the upper reaches of the Mississippi. Until both of these armies are subdued it cannot be said that the South is disarmed and at the mercy of the conquerors. But even if they were, there is an obstacle more formidable than all that remains to be subdued. The spirit of the people in the South seems wholly alienated from their late fellow-citizens. In the earlier operations of the war we were assured that there was a strong Union element throughout the whole revolted district, but that it was kept down by force of arms. But now such great towns as New Orleans, Yorktown, Norfolk, &c., are in the hands of the Federalists, and the Union sentiment is not forthcoming. Hatred and execration are everywhere apparent; the burning of cotton, the destruction of sugar, the breaking down of machinery, the devastation of everything which would be likely to benefit the North: this is the answer which the South everywhere gives to the invitations of the North. What is more extraordinary than all—the negro population do not appear to hail the Federalists as their deliverers. Negro deserters come in occasionally, but so few, that they only serve to remind us of the numbers that, whether of constraint or willingness, have cast in their lot with their masters. In all this we see little sign of the termination of the contest, and we are compelled to fall back upon the truth our Heavenly Father is constantly teaching us, that “God reigneth.”

From their miserable fighting a few good results have already been obtained, which will, we doubt not, in after times bear precious fruit. Slavery has been actually abolished in the district of Columbia and in the territories—in all the regions of America, in fact, where the Federal Government has jurisdiction. Further, a treaty has been ratified between England and the Federal Government, by which a mutual right of search is conceded to the ships of war of both countries on all suspicious vessels that hoist either the British or the Federal flag. It is under the latter that the slave-trade has of late been chiefly carried on. With the right of British search it is doomed. This treaty must, hereafter, be considered as forming of itself ample compensation for all the evils of the war.

Very painful accounts have been received from the West Coast of Africa. That terrible heathen chief, the King of Dahomey, continues his ravages all around his kingdom, and the bands of native Christians at Abbeokuta and Lagos are kept in continual terror, their only hope under God being in British protection. Among the latest of the King's atrocities is recorded his seizing on a town about sixteen miles from the Christian settlements, massacring 1,000 persons in cold blood, and carrying off the remainder of the inhabitants, about 4,000 in number, into slavery. Among these last was a native missionary, for whose fate painful solicitude is felt. Nor is he the only disturber of the peace of that region. A chief of the Ibadan tribe has seized on the town of Ijaye, and carried off a number of prisoners, among whom is an English missionary. We are almost glad that this is the case, for it gives our authorities in that quarter a right to interfere, which they were preparing to do, and we doubt not would do so effectually. We only hope that the rescue of our own countrymen will be so managed as to be productive of some benefit to the unoffending natives.

CHURCH MATTERS AT PRESENT.*

EXPERIENCE has frequently shown how rash it is to prophesy, either in political or ecclesiastical affairs. And the soundest and coolest judgment might well hesitate to pronounce, at present, any very decided prognosis concerning the future of the Church Establishment of this country. The new High Church and State organ of Archdeacon Denison takes, however, a hopeful and cheerful view; enumerates a variety of encouraging particulars, as proofs of growth, progress, and stability; yet admits withal, "there is no room for saying that the position is good." There is the Church-rate question, and, not to speak of minor matters, the question of "clerical subscription and revision of the Liturgy." This is evidently looked upon as a very perilous, though sternly pooh-poohed subject. "If it could succeed, it could only issue in the disruption of the Church. It will not succeed; but it is an evil that the question should be stirred at all, and a hindrance and offence." It is now, more than ever before, "advocated at once recklessly and feebly." And though sometimes treated as a grievance to conscience, we are told—"there is no grievance here!" Want of discipline is also an admitted evil and a weakness; and it is gravely urged that notorious sinners ought to be legally presented, and that a mandamus ought to be resorted to in order to compel the spiritual judge (? bishop), in such case, to do his duty. High Tory politics, revival of Convocation, and the exercise meanwhile of synodical authority, by judging and condemning heretical books, are also of the programme of this party; and a sturdy retention of the Scottish Communion Office strongly urged. This trumpet, it will be perceived, gives a tolerably certain sound; and a party marshalled thereby could not fail to be powerful. Time must show if the material and the combining cement exist; and then it may be seen whether England be prepared or not to bow the neck to the yoke of a clerical organization, wielding also the power derived from dignities and revenues depending upon the State. The attempt is bold; and pluck has such a tendency to success, it would be as well not to be too confident. The fear of Infidelity and Rationalism has had a tendency to drive one portion of the Evangelical party into co-operation with men whom a few years since they regarded with great aversion, and even with animosity. The untoward bicentenary bickering between Evangelical Churchmen and Dissenters (however partially or impartially the blame be distributed) alienates from each other many who might naturally be expected to unite for truth and liberty. And within the pale of the Established Church itself the growth of the questions concerning clerical subscriptions and Liturgical Revision appear to be still further dividing the Evangelical body, and perplexing the solution of the future.

On this last topic we are presented with phenomena of arguments, opinions, and practices, which are actually astounding. There must be something at bottom here worthy of a very different examination and treatment from that which is generally accorded to it by superficial, political, and ecclesiastical declaimers. In order to "Revise the Liturgy" a combination of circumstances, it is alleged, is required, which seems impossible, or so improbable, that practical men shrink from the attempt. The state of the National Synods is obstacle number one. York and Canterbury must first be fused into unity. Ireland, too, must be admitted to co-ordinate privileges; her synods must be revived. Then the system of clerical representation in synod is defective, and must be reformed. Then the laity, in these days of liberty and representative government, claim also, and are conceded to be entitled, to have a voice in the government of their Church. In fact, a synod, or convocation, which should properly represent the Established Church of the United Kingdom, would be a thoroughly new creation. Supposing these difficulties overcome, and such a National Convocation created, then the state of parties in the Church is obstacle number two. The Evangelical party, zealous in defence of Gospel truth, deprecate a revision which would either defer to the BROAD, and dilute sound doctrine to milk and water; or to the HIGH, and establish an inconvenient, and to themselves a more offensive, situation than now can be plausibly argued for from the Prayer-book. Not any of the three great parties would probably expect to be able to modify the book so as to drive their opponents out of the National Church, even if they wished to do so. While many, therefore, may desire revision in the abstract, it is plain that few expect it to arrive in their day; though a few do labour on for it, with the object of keeping alive that other question which lies at bottom, and which is the galling yoke of a subscription to multifarious, and, perhaps, contradictory human propositions—the unfeigned assent and consent to each and every thing in a voluminous book which is not inspired of God.

Lord Ebury's recently-discussed bill related only to the last point mentioned. He would leave subscription to the doctrinal articles as it stands. He would, it seems, leave also the declaration that the book "containeth nothing contrary to the Word of God." And he would leave still binding the obligation to conform to the use of the book, and none other, in public ministrations. He would only take away the "assent and consent," &c. The pamphlet containing his speech, his merited castigation of the Bishop of Oxford, and the comments of the public press, is a curious contribution to the history of this question. Except upon homœopathic principles, however, it is difficult to imagine how such a measure as Lord Ebury's could have either the deadly tendency deprecated by Lord Dungannon, or the beneficial results intended. Judging from numerous publications before us, neither those who for conscience' sake have left the Church could return without a larger measure of relief, nor would those who still remain feel themselves very much helped. To declare that a book "contains nothing contrary to the Word of God," to agree therefore to use it, and then to refuse to "assent and consent" to all its contents, does not seem very logical. Mr. Jukes thinks the Prayer-book doctrine of baptism is actually contrary to the Word of God, and he therefore refuses to conform. The Bishop of Exeter used the nonconformity of Mr. Jukes, and his reasons, as a handle to his axe to hew therewithal the Evangelical clergy. He pointed out Mr. Jukes as an honest man and a bright example, and bade them go and do likewise. Some ultra-speaking Dissenters have said very strong, and very offensive, things in a similar direction lately. Facts like these prove that there must be a prima facie case for Prayer-book revision. They seem also to prove that no mere release from "assent and consent" would suffice to an enlightened and sensitive, not to say morbid, conscience. If the legal obligations of the clergy be indeed also binding upon conscience, as contended for, it seems self-evident that no man could comfortably use a book which he believed to contain matter contrary to God's Word; and still less make a declaration to the effect that it contained nothing of the kind. While, if he could conscientiously make the last declaration, he need not shrink from "assenting and consenting" in the fullest manner.

But to rebut the charge of dishonest conformity there are, on the other side, facts and arguments remarkable also. Principally there is the grand fact that none of the great parties in the Church do accept the entire of the Prayer-book statements in the sense which a thoroughly impartial critic would affix to them, or in the sense in which the opposing parties accept those statements respectively. A very large body of clergy hold, preach, and teach salvation by works (of various kinds), notwithstanding the articles. Probably a very small number accept the 17th Article in any sense which a plain mind would feel satisfied was its plain grammatical sense. If the Evangelical party, who dislike the occasional offices for baptism, &c. (or some expressions therein), are to follow the kind advice of the Bishop of Exeter, and the example of Mr. Jukes, though they honestly hold to the Protestant scriptural spirit of the great body of Reformation doctrine, notoriously intended to be established as the doctrine of the Church of England, how, or on what principles, are the others to remain? Archbishops, bishops, and priests have at various times openly stated their objections to various things—the Athanasian Creed, for instance. Are they to secede also? Or are they dishonest if they don't? If an angel of light, with a whip of small cords, were to descend and purify the national temple, upon the principles of those who argue that conformity means an obligation upon conscience to receive as true, and in the plain grammatical meaning, every expression of the Prayer-book, as that plain grammatical meaning would be affixed or interpreted by opposing parties, or by the angel himself, the scene would be extraordinary. Out at one wide door, at once, would go the entire of the Broad Church party. Let the whip be handed to the Bishop of Exeter, or Archdeacon Denison, or even to Mr. Jukes, and the Evangelical party must depart also through another gap of large dimensions. Archbishop Whately, with a moderate following, would, we presume, go out at a separate vomitory. But out, each and all in turn, must go; and the last-named Archbishop, before he departed, would probably make a clean sweep of the apostolical successionists and the exclusive sacerdotalists; or if he didn't, the angel would, and the fable of the Kilkenny cats would receive a moral illustration.

Is there not, then, some great fallacy in this principle? Is it not monstrous to charge the entire body of the clergy with separate and respective dishonesties in this fashion? Is there not some confusion between the legal liabilities of the clergy (if they substantially depart from the legal duties of their position), and a yoke upon conscience which nobody ever could bear? Or, if this will not be admitted—if the legal obligation and the conscientious are identical or coincident—is there not a strong case made out either for Revision of the Prayer-book, or alteration of the terms of subscription, or both? Yet with a small exception, these last-named measures are all strenuously resisted by all parties—at least, by the Evangelical and the High Church parties. The Evangelical party seems to fear the still further deprivation of sound doctrine by any relaxation of subscription; and has no hope of any amelioration of the Prayer-book in the Evangelical direction. The High Church party, on the other hand, resists with instinctive apprehension all change or even discussion of change, as “mischievous and perilous;” and seems to found upon the status quo certain hopes of attaining more decided domination in the Church.

We think, however, it is impossible to read with candid attention the several pamphlets named at foot of this article (which are but a sample of sheafs of such), and not to be impressed with the conclusion that those questions will not rest here, but, on the contrary, are growing questions of deep importance. On the single point of the effects of baptism the variety of view, even among pure evangelicals, is perfectly astonishing. And there can be little doubt that this variety is traceable not to any difficulty about the ordinance as it stands commanded in the New Testament, but to traditions of men concerning it; and especially to the words of the office of Baptism to which “assent and consent” has been compelled. Mr. Jukes tells us that Mr. Cunningham, of Harrow, in a clerical conference, advanced the theory that regeneration was a change of state, not of nature: not a moral change, but one of outward circumstances: yet that this “change was a positive, clear, distinct, intelligible, benefit; and is conveyed to the infant in baptism; and is reconciliation with God.”

We feel it difficult to imagine a “reconciliation with God,” irrespective of moral conformity to God; and (almost equally) to conceive of such a reconciliation being effected by a formality.

Mr. Burgess dissented from Mr. Cunningham; being of opinion, “that in baptism the infant receives remission of original sin, and a principle of Divine life imparted by the Holy Ghost; a seed given to fructify or die, but always given. Also, that a repenting, believing, converted adult was not pardoned, nor received regeneration until baptism.”

Several questions are suggested by these views. As Christ's atonement was made for both original and actual sins (according to the thirty-ninth Article); as original sin is defined by the ninth Article to be the corrupt nature which remains even in the regenerate; and as by the eleventh Article justification is attributed to faith only, and not to faith and baptism, we think that a very rigid and critical tribunal could, if so inclined, make about as short work with these notions of Mr. Burgess as has been made with those of Mr. Heath.

But Mr. C. Bridges "differed from each" of the foregoing. He held that the gift of regeneration is granted to prayer, when faithful; but when no really faithful prayer is offered, then there is "no work of the Holy Ghost." And Mr. Venn "could not agree with any of these interpretations!!" He held that in the baptismal service "regeneration is said to be bestowed conditionally or hypothetically," on the hypothesis that the infant really professes faith (by its sponsor's scil.)

Therefore, if there be no faithful prayer offered, or if the sponsorial profession of faith turns out to have been a nullity, the hypothesis of regeneration, in and by baptism, is hypothesis only. It seems, however, difficult to reconcile either of these last opinions with the articles on the sacraments, and still more with the solemn offering of thanksgiving to God for a fact accomplished, which fact accomplished is spiritual regeneration, then and there.

Mr. Dibdin, however, a staunch opponent of revision, and a staunch upholder of the "believer," or "hypothetic" theory, goes a step further than most we have seen. He reverses the notion of Mr. Burgess, that where there is no baptism there is no regeneration; and boldly affirms, on the contrary, that where there is no regeneration there is no baptism. We have been accustomed to consider baptism as the sign, and regeneration as the thing signified; and differing both from Mr. Cunningham and Mr. Burgess, we have held that the sign and the thing signified are separable. But Mr. Dibdin says No; or if he doesn't, it is not easy to make out what he says. Stoutly, indeed, he opposes the Roman and Tractarian notion of "baptismal regeneration." Stoutly, also, the notions of Mr. Burgess and Mr. Cunningham. He says the visible and invisible, or spiritual, Church are one and the same—"A company of faithful men," according to the article. If a child be admitted into the visible Church, it is admitted into the spiritual Church, for the visible Church consists only of "faithful;" and if the child be not faithful, it don't enter at all. In other words, though the office of the Prayer-book has been formally used, the child is not baptized at all. If what the sponsors "say" be true, the child is regenerate before baptism; then the clergyman baptizes (? performs); then thanks are given to God. If what the sponsors "say" be not true, the child is not only not regenerate, but "not baptized;" because baptism is a sacrament, and a sacrament consists of two parts; and if both parts be not present, there is no sacrament, ergo no baptism! This argument may appear grotesque to some; but any one reading Mr. Dibdin's pamphlet will find it easier to detect its enormous fallacy than to reconcile the two statements of the catechism (as to the nature of a sacrament) with each other and with the doctrinal articles. One statement makes a sacrament to be an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace. In harmony with this statement, the twenty-ninth Article declares that wicked men may gnash with their teeth and receive the bread and wine (the "sign or sacrament"), without receiving the thing signified. And the rubric for the communion of the sick declares that in a certain state of penitence and faith, the dying man doth eat and drink the body and blood of Christ, profitably to his soul's health, although he doth not "receive the sacrament with his mouth." But then while these authorities testify that "sign" and "sacrament" mean exactly the same thing, another statement of the catechism makes a sacrament to consist of two parts—viz., both the sign and the thing signified. Mr. Dibdin, we presume, felt himself pressed by this statement. And as the opus operatum doctrine is as repugnant to the Articles as it is to Scripture reason and experience, he concludes, in the opposite direction, that where there is no grace there is not any sacrament. He says: "Now we affirm that if a person is not regenerate he is not baptized, according to the Church of England. The Church of England considers none baptized who are not regenerate; for in baptism there is both the inward spiritual change and the outward ordinance, and unless both are there, the person is not baptized!" (Sic.) What, then, if a child non-regenerate before or in the performance of the ordinance, becomes in after life regenerate, spiritual, converted, is he to have the water and the words administered again? By no means, says Mr. Dibdin; the Nicene Creed declares there is "one baptism for the remission of sins!" Some people would conclude that as, according to this divine, the first performance was no baptism, being no sacrament, the Nicene Creed scarcely touches the point. But we must forbear. Meanwhile, however we may wonder that these clergymen should resist Liturgical Revision or alteration of subscription, no one of good sense, not to speak of modesty and charity, will venture to affirm that such excellent men, who are but types and samples of thousands of others devoted to God and to the Gospel, are either unconscientious knaves or intellectual drivellers; though they appear driven to some logical shifts which others think they see to be fallacies, while they cannot so see them. Indeed, it is possible that tenderness of conscience is itself the very cause of these endeavours to reconcile what some think to be plain contradictions. At any rate, we believe that a case has been made out for change; and that a growing conviction will ensue with both statesmen and the public, that religion and morals demand such an alteration. In our judgment the boldest will prove the wisest plan. Why should clergymen be dealt with differently from barristers or judges? Why could not the State determine on what terms a clergyman holds his living? And if he violate these terms, he could be deprived; the tenure being Dum se bene gesserit. Why add a yoke to conscience, which is no department for the State to meddle with? especially since this whole process of subscription, and assent and consent, has proved so ridiculous a failure, as to producing either unity of opinion or union of heart, not to speak of the shock to morals which that failure has involved.

POPULAR IGNORANCE OF LANDS NEAR HOME.*

It is no uncommon thing at the present day to hear persons descanting eloquently on subjects with which they are but superficially acquainted, and to find authors and authoresses utterly ignorant of the very matters on which they profess to inform the general public. These trite and common-place remarks are forcibly exemplified by the little work whose title we give below. Written with the design of amusing and instructing children, "Near Home" would have proved very useful, from the simplicity of its style, had it been even tolerably accurate in its statements. But we regret to say it abounds with so much positive untruth, on several subjects, that its very large circulation is calculated to do much harm.

We have always felt it a standing disgrace that so many in this country are ignorant of the real state of things on the other side of the Channel. From the manner in which not a few speak of Ireland and the Irish, no foreigner would imagine that one-third of the population of that country are of the same religion and of the same race as ourselves. Roman Catholic writers are of course naturally anxious to exaggerate the majority which the followers of that religion possess in the sister country, and English Protestants too often derive their ideas of Ireland from such sources, and thus unintentionally weaken the cause of Protestantism in Ireland.

But it is really too bad when a writer professing to instruct children perpetuates such mistakes, and with Dublin within eleven hours' journey of London, displays an ignorance which would scarcely be pardonable were she writing about Pekin or Jeddo.

For instance, this writer coolly informs us that "Ireland has very few trees, and it has great bogs;" that "it rains there almost every day;" that the food there is "potatoes, and sometimes bacon, milk and whiskey;" as she ludicrously describes it, "potatoes for breakfast, potatoes for dinner, and potatoes for supper;" that the dress in Ireland is "rags;" and "there are more beggars" in Ireland "than in any other country in Europe."

We fancy, if she ever visited Ireland—which we are inclined to doubt—the writer must have derived her impressions from a ride by rail across country from Dublin to Galway, or from a visit to Killarney at a wet season, though Killarney certainly is not wanting in foliage; and as respects "the beggars," it is clear she has never visited Italy or Turkey, not to speak of other lands of Europe. Since the famine of 1845, too, potatoes have ceased to be the staple food in Ireland. The ordinary run of Irish cabins is thus described:—

What are they made of? Earth, with a few stones mixed up with it, and the roof is covered with turf. Where is the window? Where is the chimney? There are none. Only one square hole serves for the door, and through it the smoke goes out and the light comes in. There is no pretty flower-garden with a walk up to the door—nothing but heaps of dirt outside. Inside there is no floor—only the damp earth. The rain comes down upon the pig and all in the house through the holes in the roof. . . .

Once, most of the cottages were in this miserable state; but now there are many neat and comfortable cottages; and many of the hovels have been pulled down.

* Near Home; or, the Countries of Europe Described. By the Author of "Peep of Day." London: Hatchard and Co., Piccadilly. 1860.

That there are still some such hovels in Ireland is probably true, but they are rapidly disappearing, and this is an exaggerated and incorrect description of the ordinary Irish cabin.

Our readers, however, will be better able to judge of the amount of dependence to be placed on this writer's statements by the following extract, which is her entire account of the state of schools in Ireland :—

Sometimes they go to school ; but an Irish school is a curious sight. There are some schools where poor children are taught under the hedges or a haystack ; but as it is always raining, it is unpleasant to have no roof. Let me show you a better school.

There is a hut made of clay, with a roof of turf. Close to the door the smaller boys sit ; they could not see to read their books if they were further in, because there is no window. Inside some ragged boys are lying on the ground, and some sitting on a board, while tall boys are standing up, leaning over the rest, and holding their books to the light. These are the most attentive scholars. The master is as ragged as the boys, and is seated in the midst of them on a high seat. That seat is a butter-barrel, turned upside down. Just outside the door there is a heap of turf. Each little boy has brought a piece as payment to his master for the trouble of teaching him. See now—school is over—each laughing boy puts his spelling-book and his slate into his pocket and rushes out of the hut. The master goes out too, locks the door, and puts the turf into a sack, and carries it on his shoulder across the bog to his own hut.

The Irish have a language of their own, but they learn English at school. In some parts of Ireland the people have forgotten their own language, and speak nothing but English.

Had the foregoing caricatures of truth appeared in a work of the character of Punch they would have been intelligible. But that a book, written by a pious author, and published by a respectable house, professing to give true descriptions, and to convey geographical and general information respecting adjacent countries, should contain such outrageous fables, is too bad. Will our readers believe that this absurd production was actually admitted on the list of publications sanctioned by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge ; and only expunged therefrom upon the remonstrances of persons of the highest literary and academic standing ?

As to schools, it is scarcely necessary to observe that the entire country of Ireland is studded over with rival schools of the Irish National Board of Education and the Church Education Society, as well as those of the Presbyterian Church, and some missionary bodies ; in all of which an education of a very high character is notoriously imparted. Equally notorious is the fact of the large amount of money expended by Government and these societies ; as well as the neat and effective character of their buildings and the most of their arrangements ; though it may not be so generally known that the books and maps of the Irish Board are considered so superior, as to be very extensively used in schools even in England.

As to language, it is rather amusing to be informed that “the Irish learn English at school.” Did our author know that the number of Irish who do not speak English vernacularly is estimated at less than half a million ? That of the population of Ireland, amounting to some seven millions or so, there are not above a million who understand Irish at all ; and that these are rapidly diminishing ? We may observe, also, by the way, that teaching the Irish-speaking natives to read their Bibles in their own language was found at last to be the effective method of eradicating that language, and introducing the English, after a long period of criminal blundering in a contrary direction. The sagacity of Samuel Johnston, indeed, anticipated this result nearly a century ago, but it was long ere his noble and philosophical principles were effectively applied to the Irish population. After advocating the right of every people to read the will of God in their own language, and the duty of others to impart such instruction, he adds: "When they read the Bible, they will naturally wish to have its obscurities cleared, and to know the history, collateral or appendant. . . . When they once desire to learn they will naturally have recourse to the nearest language by which that desire can be gratified, and one will tell another that if he would attain knowledge, he must learn English."

As to the fact of there being any Protestants at all in Ireland, it is only obscurely intimated as follows: "The Irish say they are Christians, yet most of them will not read the Bible." Allowing that Roman Catholics are a numerical majority, and that no Roman Catholics will read the Bible, this is rather a cool way, nevertheless, of ignoring the existence of more than two millions of Protestants; with an Established Church under two archbishops, eleven bishops, and above two thousand clergy; to say nothing of the Presbyterian Churches, and other religious bodies; or of the University of Dublin, and the more recent Queen's University of Ireland, with its Colleges at Belfast, Cork, and Galway. Our author, indeed, refers to the work of the Irish Church Missions Society, but seems otherwise to ignore the existence of Protestants in Ireland; and to regard that country as in much the same position as India or China.

Nor are such gross misrepresentations as these harmless, or only deserving to be laughed at; they tend to produce and to continue ill feeling and alienation, where every effort ought to be made to produce the contrary. If the entire of the inhabitants of Ireland, as subjects of the same Sovereign and under the same laws, ought to be more and more unitedly drawn together for the common Imperial good, much more ought the possessors of pure Evangelical religion in the two countries endeavour to prevent misunderstandings, and labour for the same end. But children trained up in such notions, and filled with such prepossessions as abound in this volume, will be but too likely to follow the lead of their instructors, and conclude their advertisements with the too common and unworthy insult, "No Irish need apply."

But not only is Ireland thus dealt with in the volume before us. Other countries are subjected to the same sort of kakeidoscopic treatment. Our space will not allow us to go further into detail, nor is it necessary. But when this writer pretends to inform us, for example, that Sweden is nearly as flat as Holland, that "there is indeed some rising ground, but not many hills," and that the King of Sweden "makes the poor people do whatever he likes," we think it is time to shut up the book. Were it, as we hinted, a work of fiction, its attractions, which have secured it so large a circulation, would not demand to be counteracted. But inaccuracies and misrepresentations so glaring, from whatever sources the author has compiled them, require to be exposed, and render the book a very unsuitable one for parents to place in the hands of their children.

BALLANTYNE'S FIRST LESSONS IN SANSKRIT.*

WE have frequently in this journal urged upon the attention of those persons desirous of making way with the Indian mind the importance of the study of the Sanskrit. That study, once so formidable and repulsive, has of late years been much simplified, and the neglect of it is so much the more inexcusable. By means of the valuable helps now provided, a rudimentary acquaintance with the language can easily be obtained, which would be of great service to a missionary or civilian even in prosecuting the study of the vernacular Hindustani or Bengali.

Of all the books recently published on this point, Dr. Ballantyne's is the simplest and most original. It is an attempt to apply to the study of Sanskrit the plan which has been found so useful in the case of Latin by the late Rev. T. K. Arnold. Originally drawn up for the use of the English pupils in the Benares Government College who were also students of Sanskrit, it is no less adapted for students of that language in England, for the Hindu student in an Indian College, who has devoted himself to the study of English, and an English youth stand much in the same position as regards their entrance on the study of Sanskrit.

The "First Lessons in Sanskrit" are intended to precede the formal study of the grammar, and the student who will persevere in wending his way through them will find Sanskrit grammar afterwards an easy study. Almost insensibly he must get acquainted with the Devanagari alphabet, which we would advise him at once to endeavour to master, not, indeed, at first to attempt to commit to memory all the characters, simple and conjunct, of that intricate alphabet, but as he goes along writing the exercises, which are so simple as to give him little trouble, to learn each new letter or combination that comes in his way. Thus, without drudgery, he will soon learn to read Sanskrit in its own peculiar character, and we can assure him that Dr. Ballantyne will give him a relish for entering, not only on the study of Professor M. Williams' Sanskrit Grammar, but also of the more difficult works of Professor Wilson and of the native grammarians.

The Introduction to the Hitopadesa was much wanted, and will be greedily devoured by Sanskrit students. It is also furnished with an analytical vocabulary of the Sanskrit words used in the extracts. In a work like the "First Lessons" such a vocabulary must needs be of the analytic character, and as Dr. Ballantyne has arranged his work there is no chance of the student learning to rely on such helps.

We are glad to perceive that Dr. Ballantyne does not agree with the Anglicising attempts of the Boden Professor at Oxford, who is too prone to decri, not only the use of the Sanskrit character, but also the study of the native grammarians. Speaking of the system of the Pandits of India, that scholar (Professor Williams) thus writes: "Had they designed to keep the key of the knowledge of their language, and to shut the door against the vulgar, they could hardly have invented a method more perplexing and discouraging to beginners. Having required, as a preliminary step, that the student shall pass a noviciate of ten years in the grammar alone, they have constructed a complicated machinery of signs, symbols, and indicatory letters, which may be well calculated to aid the memory of the initiated natives, but only serves to bewilder the English tyro."

Referring to this subject, Dr. Ballantyne writes in his "Suggestions in regard to Elementary Study," postfixed to his "Sanskrit Lessons":—

It is a great mistake to suppose that the marvellously-condensed grammar of Pānini (the chief of Sanskrit grammarians) is designedly obscure. The charge of intentional obscurity might with equal reason be brought against the Binomial Theorem, which Newton assuredly never intended as an enigma. . . .

It would be out of place here to go much farther into the question of the native Hindú system of grammar, but I feel bound to state, briefly, that the apparently prevalent notion in regard to the order of the studies of a young Brāhman is incorrect—and mischievously incorrect. I feel the more bound to mention this briefly (reserving a fuller explanation for a possibly future occasion) because I myself, in the Preface to the English version of the Laghu Kaumudi (published at Benares in 1849) re-echoed, in some measure, the erroneous tradition still too prevalent. Well, then, it is true that a Hindú student requires at least ten years to become perfectly proficient throughout the whole range of the grammatical literature of the Sanskrit; but it is an erroneous inference that he studies nothing else during the ten years required for his becoming thus thoroughly proficient. Whilst he is committing to memory the condensed aphorisms of Pānini (without explanation at the time) he is not only reading quantities of poetry which his teacher explains to him in the vernacular, but he is learning paradigms of nouns and verbs—Rāmah, Rāmau, Rāmāḥ, iti prathamā; Rāmam, Rāmau, Rāmān, iti dvitīyā; and so on. He learns the Pāniniyan grammar with the view of being able, as regards the Sanskrit grammar, to render at any time (to himself in the first instance) a reason for the faith that is in him. As I am here mainly concerned about preventing the student (intended for India) from imbibing an unjustifiable and mischievous prejudice against the native Hindú expositions of grammar and philosophy, I dwell rather upon the imputations which have been cast upon these Hindú systems, than upon the merited commendation bestowed upon them by Professor Wilson, for example, who declared that the Pāniniyan grammar must be studied by every one who desired to learn Sanskrit "thoroughly and in earnest," and who added afterwards that the aphorisms of Pānini (usually spoken of, after Sir William Jones, as being "dark as the darkest oracle") are, since the issue of the English version of the Laghu Kaumudi, "now quite clear."

We trust these "First Lessons" may attain a wide circulation, as they will assist materially in the study of Sanskrit. For the sake of those who may be disposed to question the value of such studies for a missionary, we would quote the words of Dr. Ballantyne, addressed, indeed, to the civil servant, but equally applicable to the missionary: "If the Indian civil servant wishes to gain the ear, and influence the mind, of the leaders of Hindú thought—the learned Brāhmins—he must go through a course of reading more dry, and to many minds (with whom I do not here quite sympathise) more repulsive than that which has been hitherto spoken of. Grammar and metaphysics are the delight of the learned Hindú (whom all other Hindús look up to), and if you wish to reach his heart, you will do well to obtain some acquaintance with the philosophy and his grammar in the very shape in which he himself possesses them and treasures them."

FRANCE.

—, June, 1862.

THE BISHOPS AND THE FRENCH PRIESTS AT ROME.

I acquainted you in my last letter (page 285) that many of the French prelates were about to go to Rome, notwithstanding the prohibitory note of the Moniteur. We are now in possession of more precise information on this important subject.

First of all, the cardinals of our country, to the number of five, responded to the appeal of the Roman Pontiff. It would seem that these eminent ecclesiastical personages maintained an attitude comparatively moderate. This, on their part, was altogether natural. They have already attained the highest object of sacerdotal ambition, and no longer need, by the ardour of their zeal, to attract towards themselves the attention and the favours of the Papacy. Moreover, being members of the Senate, they better understand the political difficulties of the matter, and have more consciousness of their own responsibility. Cardinal Morlot in particular, Archbishop of Paris, Grand Almoner to the Emperor, and member of the Privy Council, urgently recommended prudence and self-restraint to his colleagues in the episcopal body.

The bishops, however, had not the same reasons for being reserved. Those who went to Rome were to the number of about seventy—that is to say, they constituted the great majority of the French episcopate; for there are, in our country, eighty-nine or ninety bishops. Those who remained in their dioceses were, for the most part, prevented from undertaking so long a journey, either by their advanced age, or by the feeble state of their health.

Some prelates took their departure in pompous array. The Bishop of Nismes, for example, convened the priests and bigots of the country, and this fanatical multitude greeted him with enthusiastic shouts as he passed through the city to the railway station.

The embarkation of the prelates at the port of Marseilles was accompanied by demonstrations still more exciting. The bishops and the priests sang litanies, and thousands of the people cried: "Long live the Pope-king!" "Long live Rome!" or even "Down with Victor Emmanuel!" "Death to Garibaldi!" These shouts displeased the liberals, who, assembling in their turn, responded: "Long live Italy!" "Long live Italian Unity!" The police had to intervene to prevent conflicts.

More than 2,500 ecclesiastics—vicars-general, curés, abbés, and monks—accompanied the seventy bishops. It was on the part of our clergy a species of invasion of the city of the Vatican. The priests from France distinguished themselves from those of other nations by the vehemence of their words and actions. They were everywhere foremost, shouting, gesticulating, surrounding the Pope's carriage, and advising the most obstinate resistance to all projects of accommodation. The Italian bishops and the Pope himself were astonished at the extreme vivacity of these French ecclesiastics. Their own habits are more diplomatic and more pacific. The Court of Rome, for many long years, has learned the art of patience; it relies on the aid of time to disperse the difficulties which it cannot surmount. But our little abbés and curés, with their furie Francese, fearing nothing, would have lighted up a fire to the very ends of Europe, had their imprudent counsels been followed.

I ought to make an exception on behalf of M. Dupanloup, Bishop of Orleans. He was, perhaps, the most influential prelate of all those who were assembled at Rome. M. Dupanloup is an Ultramontane in principle, but eminent for his intelligence and his character. It was he who, in concert with Cardinal Wiseman, composed the address which the bishops presented to Pius IX. This important document will have a place in history.

CONDUCT OF OUR GOVERNMENT, AND CONTRADICTIONS OF THE PRESS RESPECTING PONTIFICAL AFFAIRS.

Whilst, under pretence of canonising certain Japanese martyrs, the high dignitaries of the Roman Church thus formed a sort of council, what was the attitude of Napoleon III. and his advisers? Our Government offered no direct opposition to the projects of the clerical party; it avoids carefully all appearance of oppression towards the Sovereign Pontiff. Nevertheless, the Emperor has adopted measures which manifest his dissatisfaction. The Comte de Goyon, Commander-in-Chief of the French garrison at Rome, has been recalled, notwithstanding the importunities of Pius IX., who considered this general as his most powerful supporter. Our ambassador, the Marquis de Lavalette, whose liberal sentiments are well known, has been sent back to his post. The army of occupation has been diminished. In all this, without doubt, there is nothing decisive; but it is a step towards the evacuation of Rome; and if the Pontifical Court should persist in opposing to all plans of accommodation an absolute refusal, the Pope and his Ministers will be abandoned to their own resources. Then the temporal power will be at an end. As to the polemics of the French press on the affairs of Rome, our journals may be divided into three classes! The Ministerial papers—namely, the Constitutionnel, the Patrie, and the Pays—employ ambiguous terms; they labour to harmonise their sympathy for the Italians with formulas of respect for the Papacy. The Monde, the Gazette de France, and the Union, openly maintain the principles of the Jesuitical party; but these three journals have few readers. Lastly, all the Independent journals—the Journal des Débats, the Siecle, the Opinion Nationale, &c.—combat incessantly the pretensions of the clergy, and demand daily that the city and the territory of Rome should be annexed to the rest of Italy.

If the Government were to interrogate the French people on this subject, through the medium of universal suffrage, it is certain that a considerable majority would pronounce in favour of the enfranchisement of Rome. Our artisans and peasants cannot comprehend that the priests should wield the civil power. Let us then await patiently the issue of this quarrel. The bishops and the abbés, on their return from the Pontifical city, may excite a certain species of agitation amongst the ignorant classes; but this will be only a passing effervescence. The universal movement of our epoch will very shortly restore to the citizens of Rome the liberty of which they have so long been despoiled.

REPORT OF THE ROMANIST SOCIETY OF LYONS FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

You are aware that there exists at Lyons a central association of Roman Catholic missions, for preaching the doctrines of Popery amongst the heathen and in Protestant countries. This is the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. It has just published its report. The committee has received, in the course of the last year, a sum of 4,700,227f. It is interesting to see in what proportion each country has contributed to this sum:—

	Francs.
France has given	3,074,223
Italy	445,112
Belgium	276,878
Germany	261,760
The British Isles	224,668
The Netherlands	82,248
Switzerland	51,596
Portugal	26,238
The East	21,144
Spain	19,260
Russia and Poland	1,803
Other countries of the North	433
Asia	19,914
Africa	29,503
North America	146,578
South America	15,090
Oceania	3,768

Some instructive remarks may be made on this comparative table of the receipts of the great Propagandist Association of Lyons. Let us observe, first, that this society embraces in its sphere of labour operations of two classes—viz., Colonial, Continental, and other Missions, and Home Missions. Well! I see by the list which you have published in your last number (page 313) that the English Societies for Colonial Missions, &c., have received, for 1862, the sum of 196,472 pounds sterling, and the Home Missions 179,820 pounds sterling, making a total of 376,292 pounds—that is to say, more than 9,400,000*f*. The Protestants of Great Britain have therefore given towards foreign and home missions just double what has been given by the Romanists of the entire world! * On which side, I ask, is the superiority in liberality and zeal? And when the apologists of Popery accuse Protestantism of being in a state of languor, or even of death, do they not utter the grossest of falsehoods? Compare your receipts with ours, and judge whether the disciples of the Reformation do not make more generous sacrifices than the adherents of the Papacy! The 160 millions of Romanists have furnished 4,700,227*f*., and the Protestants of Great Britain alone 9,400,000*f*.! This is truly a mathematical demonstration!

Nor is this all. If we examine in detail the tabulated receipts of the Society of Lyons, we shall find that France has contributed about three-quarters of this sum. Italy has given only 445,112*f*. This is little for the country in which the Pope and cardinals reside. Ought not the heads of the Roman Church to retrench somewhat of the expenses of their tables and their households, in order to contribute more largely to the sacrifices demanded for the propagation of their faith? The British Islands (which apparently include Ireland) figure on the list only to the amount of 224,668*f*. I know not whether Cardinal Wiseman can congratulate himself on so paltry a contribution. It would seem that the Romanists of the British Isles might be more generous if they had but the will. But what is specially worthy of attention is, the extreme smallness of the sum received in Spain. What! the Romanist country par excellence, the country of Philip II., and of the Inquisition—the land which so vigorously persecutes Matamoros, and all attempts at proselytism—the Spanish people, with their numerous clergy, have subscribed only 19,266*f*.! Switzerland and Portugal, although containing a far smaller number of Romanists, have sent to Lyons much larger sums. This proves that those who condemn to the punishment of the galleys pious and worthy evangelists may at the same time be themselves the most covetous of human beings.

CELEBRATION OF THE MONTH OF MARY.

No important fact has occurred during the last few weeks in connexion with French Romanism; all the clerical activity has been transferred to Rome. I will therefore speak only of the manner in which the month of Mary has been celebrated. This month, consecrated entirely to Mary, is the month of May. Every day there are litanies, chanting, and sermons, in honour of the Virgin. Never during the rest of the year, even for the solemn festivals, such as Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, do the priests display so much of zeal and of magnificence.

Imagine to yourselves the Catholic churches, crowned on the altars and pillars with foliage and flowers—with banners, symbols, and devices of every description, invented for the worship of the woman whom the Roman Catholics call the Mother of God. A multitude of devotees fills the sanctuary, in particular persons of the female sex. A priest—generally a young priest, handsome, and elegantly attired—pronounces the litanies—"Mother of God, pray for us! Mystic Rose, pray for us! Heart of David, pray for us! Star of the Morning, pray for us! Star of the Sea, pray for us!" and so on. The whole assembly repeats these words with an excited utterance, as if an electric shock had suddenly affected all. Then a preacher ascends the pulpit, and delivers, in inflated language, the panegyric of the Virgin. It is Mary who excites the compassion of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost! Mary is the source of all graces! Mary only is capable of responding to the supplications of poor sinners, and of appeasing their consciences! Mary restores health to the sick! Mary gives fertility to the country! Mary revives everything, cures everything, does everything!

* This is far from representing the real state of the case, which is, in fact, still more to the honour of Protestantism than as suggested by our correspondent. The Lyons Propaganda includes missions to the heathen; four Protestant societies for a similar purpose, raised, last year, upwards of 400,000*f*. This was exclusive of the amounts raised for foreign missions by Protestant societies in Scotland and Ireland.—Ess.

What is the result of such a worship? Obviously, that the ignorant, the bigoted, the weak-minded, and the ardently-imaginative, concentrate all their religious life in the invocation and adoration of the Virgin. Our Heavenly Father is, to such minds, hidden behind thick clouds; the Son descends to a secondary place. He is no longer the Saviour; He becomes the Infant Jesus—Il Bambino, as the Italians say—and He appears most frequently, to the eyes of these semi-idolators, in the arms of His mother, as a mere appendage of Mary. Be not astonished if this profane worship should hasten the downfall of Popery. It is the most offensive manifestation of a degenerate communion; and the justice of the Lord must strike the Church which deprives Him of His glory to transfer it to a mere creature. Does not contemporaneous history present striking illustrations of such chastisement from on high? When Pius IX. proclaimed the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, all the organs of Ultramontaniam announced that the Papal Church was about to enter on an era of victories and of prosperity, inasmuch as the Holy Virgin would assuredly recompense servants so devoted. But what have we witnessed since the proclamation of this doctrine? The Papacy has experienced check upon check. Pius IX. has lost the greater part of his temporal domains, and is threatened with the loss of all the rest. The convents of Italy have been generally suppressed; and the number of the adversaries of the Jesuitical faction increases daily, even in Austria! Certainly the Virgin Mary has but ill responded to the hopes of the false prophets who promised to her adherents such wonderful triumphs!

PETITION TO THE SENATE FOR THE RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF PROTESTANT SYNODS.

A man well known in French Protestant circles for his piety and devotedness, M. de Coninck, who resides in the city of Harre, has recently addressed to the Senate a petition, in which he demands the re-establishment of national synods. The reasons alleged by the honourable petitioner are of a very grave character. He demonstrates, by numerous quotations, that our Reformed Churches are a prey to lamentable disorders, in relation both to preaching and to theological instruction. Pastors and professors, belonging to the negative school, attack the divinity of Jesus Christ, His miracles, His resurrection—all the supernatural facts related in the Scriptures. If French Protestantism had a synod, or an annual general assembly, legally convened, these scandals and this anarchy would soon be repressed; whilst, in our present situation, the consistories, isolated from each other, can scarcely do anything. M. de Coninck, therefore, solicits from the Senate (whilst invoking our ancient discipline and our organic laws) the restoration of the synodal system. M. le Baron Brenier, Secretary to the Committee of the Senate, did not dispute the melancholy facts adduced by M. de Coninck; but he objected that the existing Legislature did not explicitly require the establishment of a national synod. He therefore moved the order of the day, and the Upper Chamber adopted it. M. de Coninck has thus been foiled in his attempt; but we must not, therefore, be discouraged. The want of a great synodal assembly is becoming more and more felt by the intelligent and pious members of our flocks. It may be hoped that the civil power will not always refuse us the means of introducing into our midst a legitimate doctrinal authority, and a regular discipline. Synods are indispensable to the Presbyterian Churches.

ESTABLISHMENT FOR EPILEPTIC PATIENTS,
FOUNDED BY M. JOHN BOST.

The name of the Rev. John Bost is familiar to English Christians. This excellent friend of the poor and afflicted has, in great Britain, met with generous benefactors, who have aided him in founding and extending, in the commune of Laforce, department of Dordogne, charitable establishments, designed for idiots, the paralytic, the blind, the infirm of every description. You will therefore learn with pleasure, that M. Bost has just opened a hospital for epileptics. This, I believe, is the first establishment which has been instituted in France for this class of the afflicted. Those who suffer from the terrible malady of epilepsy deserve, like other invalids, all our compassion. May the Lord deign to bless this new labour of love!

THE PROTESTANT CHURCH AT VILLEFAVARD.

Upon none of the stations of the French Evangelical Society does the eye rest with more satisfaction than that of Villefavard, in the Haute-Vienne. It may well be regarded—to use the language of the committee—as “one of the brightest missionary spots in the heart of France.” A few years ago it was wholly sunk in Popish ignorance and superstition; now it has a Protestant Church and pastor, day and Sunday-schools, and a population advancing in the knowledge of the Gospel. Some of our readers may remember that the schools, which had long been closed, were, some time since, re-opened, by the Emperor's orders. The pastor writes:—

Nothing moves me more than the singing of those children, which is performed indeed with much harmony. The intelligence of our pupils strikes me; in the first time of my residence here I should have never expected such a development to take place in a rude and ignorant population. But the Gospel has raised even their intellectual standard, and is it not a striking fact to see four students of divinity studying now at Geneva and Lausanne, and all children of la Haute-Vienne?

The authorities have positively enjoined that no pupil be admitted into our schools unless the son of Protestant parents. That clause has not given us any hindrance, for at Villefavard itself all the families have declared themselves Protestant; but at Balledent and Chateau Ponsac, where the majority of the inhabitants are still Roman Catholics, and, although friends of our Church, do not dare to separate openly from Catholicism, the number of pupils is not so large; nevertheless, that prohibitive clause has been the means of bringing many others to the open profession of the truth as it is in Jesus. Indeed, we may say, that the moral influence exercised by our schools is very great. The priests had so often predicted that heresy was entirely rooted out of our department, and that our schools would never be re-opened, that the sight of them, with the important number of their pupils, is an unceasing demonstration of the power of the Gospel.

Public worship is also very well attended. Our church is always full, and the Lord encourages me by numerous signs of the influence of the preaching of the Word. You know how unhealthy our village is; fever prevails here during almost all the year, and chiefly in summer; the mortality is great; but it is my consolation to think that all the members of my flock, whom God calls, are prepared to meet Him. Lately a man of Roussec came to fetch me, because a friend of his was dying in a small hamlet where no other Protestant was to be found. I went there. That poor man was an earnest Christian; during his sickness the priest and nuns had tried in vain to terrify and perplex him by all possible means. He had firmly resisted them, saying, “What need have I of you; I have Christ and him crucified.” Notwithstanding his weakness, which was extreme, that brother told me how much his soul thirsted after the Lord, and expressed his wish to partake of the Lord's Supper before going to partake of it in heaven. He wished that we should insert on his tomb the following passage: “Christ is my life, and to me death is gain.” That brother had an extended knowledge of the Bible, and could quote whole chapters of it without omitting one word. Is it not cheering to think that in that remote and dark region there remained that solitary but faithful witness of the Lord?

We are happy to learn that in all the other parts of the Haute-Vienne the work shows increasing prosperity. A member of the Committee of the Evangelical Society of France writes:—

At Limoges public worship is very well attended; the schools are flourishing, and there is in the congregation a spirit of sacrifice, which is shown by the fact that they collected last year more than twelve hundred francs in favour of our Evangelical Society. I am also very glad to add to this news a very interesting fact, which we consider as an important victory of religious liberty. In one of our most interesting stations—at Fouqueure (Charente)—public worship had been interdicted during nine years, the temple shut, and the pastor, M. Boniface, with two or three elders, put in prison for four months, in 1854. But last week, by a decree of M. de Persigny, our brethren were allowed to meet in future.

ITALY.

Florence, June 18, 1862.

GRAND CONVOCATION OF PRELATES AT ROME—
THE CANONIZATION OF THE JAPANESE MARTYRS.

The great event of the month is the assembly of Roman Catholic dignitaries in Rome. The martyrs of Japan have been solemnly canonized, and the real business of the convocation has followed. The Pope had openly proclaimed to his people, and Antonelli had officially communicated to the Governments of Europe, that the object of this unprecedented gathering was purely religious. This was more than could be believed from such sources, but the declarations were gladly received by the public. The ruse, however, is too plain to be successful. It is true that the Holy Father has not dogmatically propounded to the throng of bishops the necessity of the temporal power to the independence of the Church; but the bishops, under proper inspiration, are trying as unanimously and forcibly as possible to declare the same thing in an address to the Pope, the martyr of the Vatican, the innocent sufferer at the hands of Victor Emmanuel and Louis Napoleon. At Civita Vecchia, too, the Papal authorities have opened a new prison, the construction and cruel arrangements of which remind one of the inscription over the old Neapolitan dungeon, "Let all lose hope who enter here." The Papacy is opening up its true character to the astonished Italians; so that though Bourbon intrigue and French troops hold sway in the capital of Italy, and the whole Roman question seems shelved for an indefinite period, we are really advancing another step towards the only true solution of the problem in the growing convictions of the people, that both Pope and temporal power must be got out of the way. The Parliament in Turin has drawn up, with one consenting voice, a counter-address to the King, calmly asserting the rights of Italy to her historic capital.

No priests were asked this year to celebrate the anniversary of Cavour's death, or the national festival of the "Free Constitution." In Milan, Naples, and Florence, the clergy have, of their own accord, joined with the people in these ceremonies; in Leghorn and elsewhere the churches have been denied on both occasions, and the episcopal mandates have strictly prohibited, under severest penalties, the participation of their subordinates in any such popular rejoicing. Lessons so very plain and practical are not lost on the people. "How long is this to last?" is the daily question of the influential journals. How long is the nation to be defrauded of Rome, and the people debarred from the grand temples built by their pious ancestors? You would be surprised to overhear the discussion everywhere among the better classes of a schism in the Church. The Mediators of this week is full of addresses to the Pope from companies of priests in all quarters of the country, beseeching the relinquishment of the temporal power, in order to save the ruin of the Church. The same journal publishes a third list of a thousand priestly signatures to the monster petition drawn up in the same sense by the editor, Passaglia, and eloquently contrasts the liberty accorded under the new régime to the Church with the grinding despotism exercised by the bishops, in concert with the Pope, over liberal priests in the various dioceses. Popery is fast losing its hold on the hearts of men, through the blind and bigoted policy of the Roman Court.

SYNOD OF THE VAUDOIS CHURCH.

The annual synod of the Waldensian Church opened on Tuesday, 20th May. The only strangers present this year to express the sympathies of Christendom with this vigorous Italian Church were the Rev. Dr. Stewart, of Leghorn, and Mr. M'Dougall, of Florence, ministers of the Free Church of Scotland. I need not write at length of the admirable sermon of Mr. Pilatte, the unanimous censure passed upon the opinions and conduct of Mr. Bert, of Turin—happily the only Broad Church minister in the Church—the resolution to maintain Bible-teaching in the La Tour College, despite the opposition of Government, nor the excellent arrangements adopted with regard to Waldensian licentiates, so as to facilitate the work of evangelization. By far the most novel and interesting meeting of the week was that at which the evangelists from Aosta, Genoa, Milan, Leghorn, Modena, Florence, Palermo, and other places, gave an account of their labours during the past year. Were their speeches printed, or were it possible to reproduce such a meeting in every part of England, there would be no lack of sympathy or enthusiasm in the work of these devoted men. Through the liberality of John Henderson, Esq., of Park, three prizes of 25*l.*, 20*l.*, and 15*l.*, respectively, were offered for the best essays on the "Sabbath," in regard to the Divine institution and perpetual obligation of which it is most desirable that our fellow-Christians in the Valleys and throughout Italy should be further enlightened.

PROSECUTION OF PROTESTANTS RELINQUISHED.

It affords me the greatest pleasure to inform you that the whole series of Tuscan prosecutions, of which your February number contained a detailed account, has happily terminated. That against Gavazzi was allowed to fall to the ground after a preliminary hearing, in which Christian courage and steadfastness were displayed by the eloquent padre.

Peccennini, the Elba evangelist, was condemned at Lucca, for a simple evangelical tract circulated in the island. Just as an appeal against the unrighteous sentence was being taken to the higher court of Florence, the King proclaimed at Naples the removal of all sentences pronounced in connexion with offences against the laws of the press, whereupon Peccennini was immediately absolved.

Last week the Waldensian student, Gregori, and his right-hand man, Del Buono, in the Elba Mission, were acquitted, by a majority of nine to three, in a jury of twelve, at Lucca, of all blame, in circulating tracts in defence of Evangelical truth. For the present the arm of the persecutor hangs down. Your readers cannot have been more tired of monthly references to these petty trials than we have been during the past winter annoyed by the various moves in these vexatious proceedings of intolerance and bigotry. We thank God that we are now relieved; and hope the possibility of their recurrence will be soon cut off by the assimilation of the Tuscan criminal code to that of the rest of Italy, to effect which a bill is at present under the consideration of Parliament. As an evidence that we are nearing such a consummation, and that none but priests and their tools are interested in preserving the status quo, I may mention that the advocate who defended Gregori admitted the charge of the Crown prosecutor, and the breach of the Tuscan law committed by his client, but so clearly showed the new state of things in Italy, so eloquently expounded the principles of religious liberty, and so forcibly appealed to the jury, as Italians of the year of grace 1862, that, despite the letter of the law, he obtained a favourable verdict.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN LABOURERS IN THE ITALIAN FIELD.

The arrival of the Rev. Simpson Kay, a licentiate of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, with the view of acquiring the language and evangelizing among the Italians, under the auspices of the Edinburgh Italian Society, is the practicalisation of an idea first suggested by Mr. Pilatte, of Nice, and supported by Sheriff Jameson, Dr. Revel, Dr. Stewart, and others. We are aware that Gavazzi is stoutly opposed to this plan, but the paucity of labourers in the Italian field calls for such a step on the part of our home churches, and I hope Mr. Kay will be followed by many other young men of ability and missionary zeal. What relation these labourers will hold to the Waldensian and Free Italian Churches, will be determined by circumstances in after years. Meanwhile it is right to state that both the English Wesleyans and the American Foreign and Christian Union have established missions in Italy independent of the native churches. The former body is well represented by Mr. Piggott, in the valley of Aosta, where, with a converted priest for his assistant, he has already gathered a goodly congregation. The Rev. Richard Green, to the regret of all the friends of Italy, has been obliged to leave Naples, and return to England in ill health. The American agent in Italy is the Rev. E. E. Hall, of Florence, who has several evangelists and colporteurs in his employ in Elba, Tuscany, and Piedmont. In contrast to this, there are no Scotch missions in Italy, as the ministers from the Free Church of Scotland have for many years past confined themselves to aiding the Waldensian and Free Italian Church operations. Our only desire is that all these various methods and agencies may be made abundantly useful, and that other churches and societies may be led to enter the field and aid in the regeneration of Italy.

The examinations of the three Evangelical schools in Florence have recently taken place, and given great satisfaction.

Mr. Salamon, the Waldensian pastor at Modena, has published an able defence of his principles in reply to an ignorant article in the newspaper of the place, warning all good Catholics to stifle their curiosity, and on no account visit the heretical meeting-house.

The Rev. Mr. Appia, of Palermo, has sent forth "Rome and the Scriptures," as a reply to "Catholicism Expounded to the Waldenses," by Turano, a Sicilian priest. It is a large work, covering the whole field of controversy, and written with talent and Christian earnestness.

In Florence, on the 27th of April, one of the leading ornaments of the American pulpit, Dr. Bethune, of New York, grandson of the sainted Isabella Graham, entered into his rest.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, June 13, 1862.

COURSE OF EVENTS IN PRUSSIA AND ELECTORAL HESSE.

The two countries of Germany of which I spoke to you in my last letter each proceeds in its course of political renovation, which will not remain without its influence upon the religious interests of these two peoples. The countries in question are Prussia and Electoral Hesse. At Berlin, a new Chamber of Deputies, still more liberal than that which was dissolved, has been opened, and has commenced its labours by the discussion and adoption of an address to the King, in which it professes, in the most energetic language, its monarchical principles, and denies, in the most absolute manner, the accusations advanced against it in this respect, not only by the retrograde press, but in the imprudent circular of the new Ministry upon the eve of the elections. On the other hand, the Chamber declares, with not less precision, that it takes the constitutional government as meant to be a reality; and its voice may well be considered as that of the nation, as it has been a second time elected by imposing majorities. In England, the Ministry would at once resign, after such an expression of the opinion of the country. At Berlin, it remains in office—a proof that it does not understand representative government, which determines the duration of the personal government. And this impression is confirmed by the reply of the King, on receiving the address of the Chamber. It is impossible that the conflict should not again break forth upon each of the great questions to be discussed. God grant that the struggle, whatever its issue, may be confined to the field of politics, properly so called, and that by no party any attempt may be made to extend it to religious questions, which have everything to lose by being mixed up with such discussions!

In Electoral Hesse the despotic Ministry has at length fallen, not in obedience to the popular will, so often expressed throughout the country, but because the German Diet positively required that its legal constitution should be restored to it, and because Prussia had concentrated her troops upon its frontier. There is, therefore, an end of the politico-religious system, which has been pressing for ten years upon the people of this small state, and by which injustice and oppression were practised in the name of Christianity. In future, whatever may be the politics of the new Ministry, it will be a lay Government, and no longer a power at once clerical and despotic. In future, it will be possible to preach and profess the Gospel of Jesus Christ without passing, in the eyes of the people, for an agent of the Court, pursuing earthly and selfish objects in disguise. They have accustomed this people to identify a certain political system with religion; let the popular mind be again permitted to separate them, and to believe in the sincerity of Christians, and a great step will be taken towards bringing it back to the pure sources of Christianity. And the wish I thus express for the people of Electoral Hesse may apply equally to the greater part of Protestant Germany. And might I not add, Roman Catholic Germany? This leads me to speak of the GERMAN EPISCOPATE AT ROME.

There is now being discussed at Rome, with agonising earnestness, the great question of the temporal and the spiritual powers, so miserably confounded with each other, even among Protestant nations. Now, is it not very remarkable that, amidst the immense concourse of cardinals and priests who are at this moment agitating around the Papal throne, it is the German bishops who are playing the least important part? The Archbishop of Vienna himself is "conspicuous by his absence!" Must we conclude that our episcopate has ceased to be Ultramontane, and has given up the temporal sovereignty? No. But it is kept within bounds by an enlightened nation, and by being brought into daily contact with Protestantism. It must be said, moreover, that, having religious and moral principles more in accordance with truth than the clergy of the South of Europe, it better understands Catholicism, as it exists in that miserable little earthly kingdom, already half lost, and occupied by the troops of Victor Emmanuel. And then, may it not be imagined that this German episcopate is ashamed of a council stealthily convened, under a false pretext—that is to say, by means of a public falsehood, sanctioned by the head of the Church? Doubtless it is not without representatives at Rome; but it leaves the French bishops and abbés to agitate and intrigue under the protection of their own Government; it leaves the Bishop of Orleans and your Wiseman to employ their rhetoric in the composition of the address to the Pope—the real object of the Council, notwithstanding the solemn declaration to the contrary, twice repeated, of Pius IX. In this last effort to save a lost cause it places itself in an obscure rank among the combatants, where it can scarcely be seen. May we not believe that it will gain the more in the mind of the German nation?

THE AUSTRIAN CONCORDAT.

As for the Archbishop of Vienna, he had another reason for not appearing at the Vatican. His Government is taking measures, at the present moment, to repeal certain clauses of the Concordat, upon which, in the eye of the Holy See, its sole value depends. All that relates to mixed marriages, by which parents are compelled to educate their children in Roman Catholicism, all that relates to public education, handed over by the Concordat to the will and pleasure of the bishops, and many other similar provisions, are about to disappear officially from this famous Concordat, already wounded to the heart by the liberties granted to the Protestants of Austria. Now, it must be confessed that the Primate of the empire would, at such a moment, have presented a rather sorry figure at Rome. He would have been received there somewhat like a general who presents himself to his sovereign after a lost campaign.

Is it in a spirit of triumph that we relate these facts? God forbid. We know how to sympathise with the moral sufferings of men who have believed in that which is erroneous, and who behold it perishing in their hands. Woe to him who at the sight of such Divine judgments should not feel humbled! Besides, the causes for depression in our own churches amply suffice to prevent us from feeling elated in the presence of Catholicism. But behind the men there is a system—a system of error which conceals the truth of God from the eyes of millions and hundreds of millions of immortal souls—a system of oppression upon the conscience which, for fifteen centuries, has triumphed in its pride by fire and sword. And to see the end of this system approaching must bring joy to every enlightened mind and every upright conscience.

SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE IN HOLLAND.

Since the great question of the day, the separation of the temporal from the spiritual, has come under my pen, it will not be without interest to remark that this question has just been officially and definitively determined in one of the Protestant countries of the Continent, the most worthy of respect, from its religious history. That country is Holland, where, from the 1st of July next, the Ministries of Protestant and Catholic Worship will be suppressed. The State, in virtue of stipulations formerly entered into, will continue its grants to the different denominations for a certain number of pastorates; but it will no longer take any cognisance of their internal condition. This important measure, which secures to all the churches entire religious liberty, is, in reality, only the execution of the fundamental law of 1848, which laid down the principle of the separation of Church and State. It was worthy of this noble and interesting nation to take this initiative before all the other old churches of the Reformation upon the European Continent. Here, as everywhere else, there were two parties, opposed upon other matters, who unite in regretting this decision. These are the Ultra-Protestants and the Ultramontane Catholics; the latter, because they always think of leaning upon the arm of the State, in order to secure the ends of their earthly ambition; the former, because they persuade themselves that the Reformed Church loses its power over the nation by losing its political privileges. But they are too thorough Christians not to perceive soon, by the light of experience, that they were deceived. For ourselves, we adopt, in full, the remark upon this subject which is made by the correspondent of a Paris journal, who writes from the Hague: "It is for every Church now to demonstrate what its principles are worth. That Church which shows itself able at once to inspire and direct the national mind—which shall display the most enlightened spirit, the greatest beneficence, and shall best reduce religion to practice—will always be sure of occupying the most commanding spiritual position in the country; and what other ambition ought a church to have?" May our beloved brethren in Holland, instead of giving way to useless regret, feel increasingly the greatness and elevation of the mission which God has in these days confided to them!

DR. DORNER'S CALL TO BERLIN.

In Germany we are still far from seeing ecclesiastical questions decided in the manner referred to above. Even the most enlightened men never think of the Church but as supported by the arm of the State, though some of them wish it to possess more independence. It is only thus, as they think, that they can get hold of the entire nation. But patience: events will show themselves stronger than theories. In the meantime, the Protestant Church, and the councils by which it is governed, are strengthening themselves internally against the day when the external situation shall be altered. In Prussia, especially, there have taken place, amidst the existing agitation, some good appointments, among which we observe the call of Dr. Dorner to Berlin, as Professor of Theology and member of the Supreme Ecclesiastical Council (Oberkirchenrath). Dr. Dorner is known to your readers through his interesting correspondence with the Bishop of Cork, which you inserted in the February number of Christendom. He is still better known to the theological world from his great and profound historical and doctrinal work on the person of Jesus Christ. In him the University of Berlin gains a professor equally eminent for learning and piety; the Supreme Council a member of broad, enlightened, and moderate views; and the Prussian Church an humble Christian, though in high position. In view of the inevitable changes which the ecclesiastical affairs of this kingdom must undergo in our time, it is gratifying to know that the first religious authority of the country has been strengthened by the accession of this excellent man. Dr. Dorner—a Württemburger by birth, and in character—has hitherto occupied a theological chair at Göttingen (Hanover University), whence he was called to Berlin, under the ministry of M. von Bethmann-Hollweg. He will there rejoin his eminent fellow-countryman,

Dr. Hoffman, General Superintendent and Cathedral Preacher, with whom he will sit in the Supreme Council. There may be great advantage in this exchange of diverse gifts between nationalities so different as those of the South and the North of Germany. May the Church of Germany be thus enabled to realise the apostolic saying, "There are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit!"

THE NETHERLANDS EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE—OPERATIONS OF THE INNER MISSION—RATIONALISM IN THE PULPITS AND INDIFFERENCE IN THE CHURCH.

Amsterdam.

I will not longer delay giving you some details as to the position and labours of the Netherlands Branch of the Evangelical Alliance; but in order to do so with any degree of correctness, it is necessary to glance at the religious condition of this country generally, because this bears upon our practical efforts. In our country it is not as in England, where large bodies of different denominations exist beside the Establishment, and in every one of which there are a certain number of faithful ministers and laymen. In such circumstances the Evangelical Alliance, uniting on a large but decidedly Evangelical basis the believers of different denominations, have a common ground to maintain, without any regular labour or activity; but it is not thus in the Netherlands. The National Church contains 1,400 or 1,500 clergymen; but the Dissenters altogether—Separatists, Lutherans, Baptists, &c.—have not, I presume, 200; and, except in the case of the so-called Reform Separatists, you scarcely find amongst the Dissenters even a very small number of believing men. In our branch of the Evangelical Alliance, therefore, most of the members are of one denomination—that of the Reformed Church. Hence, as you may suppose, the very ground for an Evangelical Alliance (in the true sense of the word, as a union of believers of different denominations) has no place amongst us. Notwithstanding these unfavourable circumstances, we were so happy, nearly ten years ago, as to establish a branch on the same footing as the other branches, and on the nine articles of the basis; but we felt the necessity, in order to maintain our young society, to connect it with some active effort; and nothing seemed to us more appropriate, in the peculiar religious state of Holland, than to take up the case of the neglected and indigent classes of the community, spread over the whole land. The Inner Mission has therefore been connected with our branch of the Evangelical Alliance; and we may say that the Lord has, in the midst of great difficulties and trials, blessed our efforts in a peculiar manner. At present, we have more than forty localities, visited by fifteen evangelists, who are daily occupied in the different departments of the Inner Mission. They are as follows: 1st. The elementary religious instruction of the little ones. We may estimate the number of little children under instruction in the Sunday-schools, every week, by our evangelists, at from 3,000 to 4,000. 2nd. The catechetical instruction of young men and girls. This has been blessed by many. 3rd. The instruction of men and women whose religious education has been utterly neglected in early life. 4th. Visiting the poor and the sick. Many have been converted by the instrumentality of our labourers. We may estimate the number daily visited by our evangelists at from 200 to 300, and of these the greatest number have not been visited by the clergyman for many years. 5th. The holding of Bible readings, and the delivery of very simple practical expositions, which are most useful, because in these localities an unsound, Rationalistic, soul-perverting doctrine is preached. 6th. The formation of societies for Christian lectures, young men's societies, and Sunday-schools. 7th. The circulation in all directions of the Word of God, good books, and tracts. Now you can form an idea of the extent of our labours, and of the unparalleled usefulness and importance of our Inner Mission. Of the 1,500 clergymen, I may say, without fear of contradiction, that not a tenth are preaching a soul-saving Gospel; and in a very large portion of our villages and cities the decay of Christian faith and Evangelical life is awful. Taking into account how few are the evangelists in our service (and may the Lord give the means of extending our activity!), they are indeed the most valuable element for the preservation of the truth as it is in Christ, and are working as a leaven among the masses.

May the Lord our God send down His life-giving Spirit, and bless the efforts made by the instrumentality of the Netherlands branch of the Evangelical Alliance, of which I am now the president, after having been eight or nine years the secretary.

I ask your fervent prayers and sympathy.

Yours in the Lord,

DR. CAPADOCSE.

THE NEW LAW ON RELIGIOUS LIBERTY—CASES OF PERSECUTION—COMPULSORY INFANT BAPTISM.

A Stockholm correspondent writes us as follows:—

The so-called new Religious Liberty Law, so properly termed by the Evangelical Alliance a "compromise," has not yet been accepted by any Dissenters in Sweden, unless by the Roman Catholics. While Dissenters have continued to be harassed by lawsuits for administering the ordinances, holding meetings during the same hours as the State Church, keeping schools, &c., the final decision of such lawsuits has for a time generally been a defeat of the accuser; but through a sentence signed by his Majesty, a Baptist in Helgum, North Sweden, has been compelled to pay a fine of 150 rixdollars for administering the ordinances. A poor brother in Wernland, who had been away some distance from his home for the purpose of supporting his family during the winter, on his return was fined 50 rixdollars, the whole amount of his earnings, for having held Sunday-school during the time that the State Church held its religious services. The brother in whose house the Sunday-school was held was also fined to the same amount.

A certain class of persecutions must here especially be mentioned—viz., compulsory infant baptism. The priests coming to the houses of Baptist parents, and, against their expressed will, "christening" their infants, is the standing rule; and it is a rare exception that any child escapes their hands. But in several cases a still more shameful course is followed. When parents, from conscientious conviction, do not bring their infants to the church, the priests notify the civil authorities, who take the children by force, have them sprinkled, and charge the expenses to the parents. If in any case there should be inability to pay, personal property is seized upon. We have before us reliable information of several such cases.

While these persecutions are going on against Christian Dissenters, the professors and teachers of metaphysics at the University of Upsala, without the slightest hindrance, are allowed openly to advocate and defend infidel sentiments. And the consequence is that almost all men of education are tainted with such pernicious sentiments. The leading public papers have highly recommended a translation of Colan's Sermons, and severely reprobated the proceedings of the Consistories of Strängnäs and Gothenburg against a rector and a member of the last-named Consistory, who have both of them openly avowed infidel sentiments.

AMERICA.

ACTION OF THE PRESBYTERIAN AND BAPTIST DENOMINATIONS RESPECTING SLAVERY AND THE REBELLION.

Albany, N.Y., June 6, 1862.

ACTION OF THE OLD SCHOOL ASSEMBLY.

Among the transmutations of opinion which are now going on in this land, especially on the subject of slavery, there is none more remarkable than that which has been just expressed by the General Assembly of the Old School Presbyterian Church. It is to my own mind most honourable to that body, and a significant indication of the good which Divine Providence is about to bring from the rebellion which now afflicts this nation. The members of this body, from year to year, have been distinguished for their determined exclusion of all political subjects, their special aversion to discussion on the subject of slavery, and their resolution that their Church should not—like all others, excepting the Episcopal—be sundered on its account. Indeed, so generally prevalent and powerful was this resolution, that a favourable reference to the abolition of slavery was enough to excite a suspicion of disloyalty to the Church.

Twelve months ago, when the Assembly met in Philadelphia, and near two months after the rebellion had broken out—when, moreover, the Federal Government needed expressions of sympathy from its loyal subjects—the venerable Dr. Spring, of New York, proposed for adoption a resolution affirming “the duty of the ministers and Churches under its care to do all in their power to promote and perpetuate the integrity of these United States, and to strengthen and uphold the Federal Government.” This resolution, though so mild, and without the most distant allusion to slavery, provoked earnest and extended opposition; it was discussed through several days. A large and able minority declared it to be inexpedient and dangerous, and voted against it. It was, however, adopted, and has resulted in much good.

Now observe the change, for it is bold, remarkable, and highly gratifying. The Rev. Robert J. Breckinridge, D.D., of Kentucky, who has been a prominent pro-slavery man, and who, it may be remembered by some, held a public discussion on this subject sixteen years ago with George Thompson, Esq., in the city of Glasgow, was this year a member of the Assembly. Early in its sittings he submitted for adoption a paper which is emphatically outspoken in reference to the rebellion and its cause. It declares that there is “an almost superhuman effort in the present rebellion to base the entire framework of government on the single principle of hereditary servitude; and that the power and patronage of the general Government have, to a great extent, been wielded in aiding and abetting this effort.” It affirms that “the system that makes, or proposes to make, the relation of master and slave hereditary, perpetual, and absolute, must be wrong, as it is a negation of the principles and precepts of the Gospel, and of the very idea of civil liberty and inalienable rights.” It denounces the rebellion as a “traitorous attempt to overthrow the National Government by military force, and to divide the nation, contrary to the wishes of the immense majority of the people of the nation, and without satisfactory evidence that the majority of the people, in whom the local sovereignty resided, even in the states which revolted, ever authorised any such proceeding, or ever approved the fraud and violence by which this horrible treason has achieved whatever success it has had. This whole treason, rebellion, anarchy, fraud, and violence, is utterly contrary to the dictates of natural religion and morality, and is plainly condemned by the revealed will of God. It is the clear and solemn duty of the National Government to preserve, at whatever cost, the National Union and Constitution, to maintain the laws in their supremacy, and to restore the reign of public order and peace to the entire nation, by whatever lawful means that are necessary thereunto. And it is the bounden duty of all people who compose this great nation, each one in his several place and degree, to uphold the Federal Government, and every State Government, and all persons in authority, whether civil or military, in all their lawful and proper acts, unto the end hereinbefore set forth.” The introduction of this paper occasioned much uneasiness among those who sympathised with the rebels, or who cherished a time-serving spirit. It led to a discussion which continued through three days; and, after various resolutions to defer or prevent action had been negatived, it was adopted by the decided vote of one hundred and ninety-nine to twenty. This action is both surprising and gratifying; and it has drawn to Dr. Breckinridge personally, and to the Assembly, the affection and gratitude of many belonging to other denominations. It will,

I am sure, be followed with good to the cause of truth and freedom in this and other lands.

ACTION OF THE NEW SCHOOL ASSEMBLY.

The General Assembly of the New School Presbyterian Church, which met at the same time as the other, in the city of Cincinnati, made a long and full deliverance respecting slavery and the rebellion. The following is the language of one of their resolutions: "Resolved—That, in our opinion, this whole insurrectionary movement can be traced to one primordial root, and to one only—African slavery, and the love of it, and a determination to make it perpetual; and, while we look on this war as having a grand end in view, the restoration of the Union, by crushing out the last living and manifested fibre of rebellion, we hold that everything—the institution of slavery, if need be—must be made to bend to this one great purpose."

This body addressed a very excellent letter to the President of the United States, in which they express their confidence in his administration, their admiration of his course, and pledged him their prayers and support.

ACTION OF THE BAPTISTS.

Another illustration of the gratifying change which has taken place in public sentiment in reference to slavery has just been given by our brethren of the Baptist denomination. Their special anniversaries, which annually bring together a large number of prominent ministers and laymen from all parts of the Eastern, Middle, and Western States, were held last week in the City of Providence, Rhode Island; and they improved the occasion to give expression to their views respecting the present great crisis in our national affairs. The following resolutions were unanimously and applaudingly adopted:—

Resolved—That we regard the war now waged by our National Government to put down the unprovoked and wicked rebellion that has risen against it, and to establish anew the reign of order and of law, as a most righteous and holy one, sanctioned alike by

God and by all right-thinking men, involving our very life as a nation, and everything precious depending on that life, and related most intimately to the progress of civilisation, freedom, and Christianity throughout the earth.

Resolved—That we believe the institution of slavery to have been the principal cause and origin of this attempt to destroy the Government, and that a safe, solid, and lasting peace cannot be expected short of its complete overthrow.

Resolved—That we tender to the President of the United States and his associates in the Government our hearty sympathy and support, with the assurance of our fervent prayer that the same Divine hand which has so manifestly guided them in the past, may lead them into the full and triumphant establishment of union, justice, and liberty over the whole country, and among all ranks and conditions of the people.

THE ANNIVERSARIES IN BOSTON.

In conclusion, I will just say that it was my privilege to attend the anniversaries of our prominent religious societies, held last week in Boston, and which correspond to the May meetings in London. And though I have had this pleasure many times before, I never previously listened to such glowing expressions of Christian patriotism, such earnest and manly denunciations of slavery, nor such determined utterances of increasing opposition to that cruel, malignant, and destructive system, as were then given. Whatever the special object of the meeting, this spirit was prevalent, and it influenced the thoughts and words of almost every speaker. It was impossible to mistake the popular feeling; and while its utterances were not always wise, it unquestionably evinced a power which will continue to grow till the death-knell of slavery is heard throughout all this land.

I am thankful to say that the reports of our several societies indicated less pecuniary embarrassment, and a larger measure of success, than I expected; but my limits forbid all detail. We are hopeful that the result of this terrible crisis will be in a great and varied degree beneficial to this nation, and contribute, through us, to the advancement of the Saviour's kingdom through the world.

SOUTH AFRICA.

EFFORTS OF A NATIVE CHURCH TO ATTAIN SELF-SUPPORT: DIFFICULTIES IN THE WAY—THE WEEK OF PRAYER—TOKENS FOR GOOD.

At a time when the importance of educating the mission churches in the principle of self-support is receiving such striking practical confirmation, a statement of some of the difficulties which present themselves in the way of that desirable result will be read with interest. The writer is one of the agents of the London Missionary Society:—

Cradock, South Africa, March 3, 1862.

My own immediate charge is, as you are probably aware, composed of natives, comprising Hottentots, Bastards, Fingus, and those formerly styled Apprentices. About half the congregation reside in the village, the rest are scattered, in larger or smaller portions, on different farms in the district. The families in the village form the regular stated congregation; those in the country come in occasionally to chapel, and at other times are visited by me at their places of abode. Those in the village have, for some two or three years, been striving hard to attain the point of entire self-support, and are still striving. Were they sustained in their efforts, as they ought to be, by those in the country, the end desired would have been attained. But, unhappily, the native is inclined to look upon the calls upon his purse as a hardship (zwarigheid); and it is only by the regular, systematic visits of a collector, week by week, that the spirit of giving can be sustained; and as parties in the country cannot be thus reached, very few do anything at all towards the maintenance of religious ordinances. I have tried several times to get the system of weekly subscriptions established on the several localities where the people reside, in order to rectify this deficiency; but for want of some one thoroughly interested in the matter to act as agent, my efforts have hitherto been without the success I could have wished. You will be glad to hear that the "Week of Prayer" was observed by our people in the village. Much to my regret, I was compelled by circumstances to be absent from home during that week. I received, however, very pleasing accounts of the manner in which the several services were attended.

Looking beyond the bounds of my own immediate sphere, there are tokens for good, I think, in the whole of this district. The Dutch farmers, who form the majority of the population, have lately been greatly blessed by the acquisition of a zealous, devoted minister, and they appear to be aware of the favour vouchsafed them by God, and grateful for it. The English farmers also are desirous of greater facilities for enjoying the blessings of religious ordinances, and have been bestirring themselves in order to obtain what they desire. At present I can only thus briefly refer to these points of interest; at another opportunity (D. V.) I may be more explicit.

CHINA.

One of the agents of the London Missionary Society at Shanghai writes us, describing the difficulties experienced by himself and his fellow-labourers, especially under the trying circumstances in which they have been placed by the approach of the rebels to that town:—

Shanghai, March 18, 1862.

DESTRUCTION OF LIFE AND PROPERTY BY THE REBELS — MISSIONARY OPERATIONS RESTRICTED.

With regard to the prospect of extensive missionary work in this district there is not much encouragement. The rebellion, which is continually gaining ground, in this neighbourhood at least, is effectually preventing any systematic efforts from being made in the surrounding country. We are necessarily, therefore, to a very great extent, limited to Shanghai and its immediate vicinity. During the last few weeks the rebels have advanced in great numbers to within a few miles of Shanghai. Their presence has been marked by desolation and death. The country for miles around has been wasted by them, and thousands of the unhappy Chinese have been reduced to poverty by their ravages. It is painful to contrast the present aspect of the country with its former comparatively prosperous condition. The villages and homesteads, which only but lately abounded with every sign of rustic activity, have been deserted by their inhabitants, and the blackened walls and smouldering ruins bear sad but decisive evidence as to the character of the invader. Their design in coming has been to gain possession of Shanghai. Every preparation, however, has been made by the foreigners to resist their attempts. Upon several occasions they have been attacked by the allies and thoroughly repulsed. The large populations which were formerly accessible to the missionary have now disappeared. Immense numbers have been murdered, whilst the rest have either been compelled to become rebels or have been scattered over the face of the country. A more thorough destruction could scarcely have been accomplished.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR LABOUR IN SHANGHAI.

But whilst all without wears so unpromising an aspect, in the city of Shanghai there is much to encourage. The population of this place has, within the last two years, increased immensely. The fall of each successive place has gradually swelled its numbers. Many of the former inhabitants of Suchu and of the other large cities in this province have fled to this place, trusting to the presence of foreigners for protection against the rebel armies. The consequence is, we have an exceedingly mixed population. Thousands of these had never heard the message of salvation before they came to Shanghai. It is gratifying to find that adversity has already done much to modify the feelings of opposition which the Chinese used to exhibit towards the Gospel. It is now listened to with attention by the hundreds who weekly enter our chapels. It is to be hoped that the present favourable feelings may be strengthened into sincere and devout belief, such as shall result in the conversion of many souls.

DIFFICULTIES ARISING FROM THE CHINESE CHARACTER.

The Chinese character, however, is such that, humanly speaking, the missionary must be prepared to expend years of toil before he can expect great results. It is a hard and stony soil on which he has to work. The spirit of the world has so entered the Chinese soul, and taken such complete possession of it, that the difficulties which are continually presenting themselves seem innumerable. They are brought up in a total want of reverence for their gods. When Christianity therefore would impress upon them the necessity of cherishing reverential feelings for the Supreme Being, it is long before they can be made to comprehend what is the nature of the duty which they are called upon to perform. This no doubt will be found to be the case in almost every heathen land, but not to such an extent, I think, as in China. Again, too, their ideas of sin are exceedingly imperfect. Many indeed are unwilling to confess that they have any sin. Those who believe in the existence of sin, refer rather to the infraction of social duties and statute laws, than to any transgression of the law of God. To the Chinese, therefore, it can never appear in that aggravated character in which Christians are wont to view it.

Miscellaneous Intelligence.

MISSIONS OF THE BRITISH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES.

A correspondent obligingly furnishes the subjoined statement, by way of supplementing that contained in our last number (p. 313), respecting the various London religious societies. The amount raised for missionary purposes by the British Presbyterian Churches was, according to the last published accounts, in each case in which the exact sum could be ascertained, as follows:—

Free Church of Scotland: Foreign and Home Missions	£40,607
United Presbyterian Church: Foreign and Home Missions	27,570
Irish Presbyterian Church: Foreign and Home Missions	12,148
Four other bodies, whose exact missionary income is not ascertained—viz., Established Church of Scotland, Scottish Reformed Presbyterian Synod (Covenanters), English Presbyterian Church, and Welsh Presbyterian Church—raised at least.....	30,000

"Thus," adds our correspondent, "you will have a total of 110,000*l.* by the Presbyterians of the United Kingdom for the extension of the Gospel at home and abroad, of which the home work may require 30,000*l.*, and the foreign 80,000*l.* The other Churches of Christ throughout the three kingdoms, and throughout the world, should know this fact for their encouragement. By such fraternal emulation we may provoke to love and good works."

RELIGIOUS MEETING AT BASLE.

The fifth Conference of the Protestant Churches of Switzerland was held on the 17th of June, at Basle. Among the other subjects which engaged attention was that of the revision of Luther's translation of the Scriptures. Some of the members were desirous of carrying revision to such an extent, that it would be, in some sort, a new version. To this, however, the general feeling of the Conference was averse.

The Conference rose at five in the afternoon, and the President invited the members to take part in the inauguration of the statue of the Reformer (Ecolampadius, which had just been finished and placed in an appropriate position near the cathedral. The ceremony is described as having taken place in the most touching manner. The speakers were MM. Sarasin, Director of Public Works; Professor Hagenbach; and Pastor Güder, of Berne.

A few days before, at the Basle Mission Institute, a valedictory service was held in connexion with the departure of David Asante, a young negro, for Africa, and the Rev. Mr. Mader, an experienced missionary, who returns thither to his former field of labour.

A VISIT TO FELIX NEFF'S VALLEYS.

We have great pleasure in inserting the following letter, in the hope that the object of the writer may thus, in some measure, be promoted:—

Lyons, May 26, 1862.

Dear Mr. —,—Have you ever visited Felix Neff's valleys? We have been rambling through the two principal valleys in which Neff's congregations are scattered, Val Queras and Val Fressinières, both easily accessible from Briançon, to which we crossed from Laza. We fancy that if the beauty of the scenery in that part of the French Alps were more generally known, many more travellers would visit the neighbourhood than at present; and we feel sure that many who have been touched by the simple story of Neff's self-denying labours would, on visiting these scenes, be thankful to help those who are trying to revive the languishing condition of these missions. Missions I call them, for since I travelled through New Zealand, some years ago, I never saw anything that so fully realised my idea of the life and work of a missionary as the life and work of a pastor in these Alpine valleys.

We were very glad to find that one or two English friends, who for some years have taken great interest in these valleys, and who, in fact, have done all that has been done to provide permanent residences for the pastors, have just been concerting with the two excellent men we saw stationed in the valleys a plan for inviting some of their friends—Vaudois, French, and British, &c.—to a conference to be held in the valleys in August, if all is well, for prayer and consultation on the best mode of providing a more efficient staff of pastors and evangelists. Last week the two pastors, M. Jules Denys, of Guillestre, and M. Charpiot, of Cervieux, jointly wrote to the Moderator of the Vaudois Synod, to request that some of the members might be deputed to take part in this conference. At their request, I ventured to add a letter to our good friend Dr. Revel, to ask him to support their application, if it arrived in time to be laid before the Synod. The present most urgent needs appear to be: (1) To secure an efficient resident pastor for the Val Fressinières, which, unfortunately, has been nearly two years without a resident minister. At present, M. Jules Denys, who is in charge of Guillestre, at the opening of the Val Queras, with the mountain church of Vars, also takes charge of Fressinières, but he is not strong, and not at all fit, physically, to winter in Val Fressinières, or during winter to visit

Dourmillieuse, at the upper extremity of the valley, and the special scene of Neff's self-devotion. Then (2) there is a great need of two efficient evangelists, of a stipend of about 50*l.* each; one to be stationed at Dourmillieuse, to co-operate with the pastor of Val Fressinières; the other at Pierregrosse, Val Queras—at all events, till a district pastor can be placed there, to relieve M. Charpiot of that distant part of his charge. M. Charpiot is an admirable man for these valleys, hale and hearty, with his heart in the work, and a vigorous body to go through with it. His daughter, too, is a good schoolmistress, and keeps the communal school at Brunessard, which, with La Chalope, where the father lives within a walk, form the two chief Protestant populations near Cervieux. M. Charpiot also regularly takes charge of Pierregrosse, where a new presbytery is building, or rather is stopped for want of funds, and St. Veran, the highest commune in the French Alps, perhaps in Europe. We accompanied him to St. Veran on Sunday, and were much interested in his little flock there, and in the manifest good work going on. Towards the conclusion of the afternoon service we were much surprised to see a cluster of Roman Catholics round the open door of the little church listening to the sermon, which we found was not an unusual occurrence there; indeed, both the pastors feel that if these missions could be sufficiently worked, there is reason to hope that much good might result, from the readiness with which Roman Catholics have of late purchased copies of the Scriptures, and from their generally friendly disposition. At Guillestre M. Denys has an efficient school, under an excellent mistress, Madame Laugier, daughter of the Brigadier of Gens-d'armes in Val Queras. M. Laugier, with his wife and daughter, have all become converts within the last two years, under M. Denys' good influence. He is an excellent man, and came to the valleys drawn by Felix Neff's memory, but he is not strong enough to rough it in the high valleys in the winter. It would be a great matter if pastors and evangelists in these valleys could be men combining what Neff so happily combined—the power of earnest religious teaching with the power of teaching and causing the people to improve their domestic and physical condition; for they are in sad need of bodily improvement, and certainly require to be taught and shown that Christianity ought to include the renovation of the whole man. The Val Queras population are in this respect, however, decidedly ahead of their Val Fressinières neighbours, who are the most deplorable set of poor creatures I think I ever saw. Cretinism seems to prevail amongst them sadly, but it does not in Val Queras, and both are pretty equal as to poverty; the one is much more energetic and self-dependent, and consequently higher in standard than the other. Begging is almost unknown in Val Cervieux and St. Veran, &c., but by no means so in Val Fressinières or at Guillestre. Perhaps you already know Mr.

Fremantle, Rector of Claydon, Bucks, who, with Mr. Milson, an English merchant here, seem to be the only two English mainstays for these valleys of late years. Mr. Burgess has kindly helped, through these two gentlemen, from his Foreign-Aid Fund, but there does seem real need of increased help.

SCHOOLS IN NAPLES.

We have been favoured with the following extract from a letter, written by a Protestant lady, wife of one of the Italian senators:—

Turin, May 26.

While at Naples, I went to see our school, founded by the Italian Ladies' Association, at Torre del Greco—consequently Roman Catholic, without bigotry. It has now been opened two months, and there are about seventy little girls rescued from among the houseless victims of the late eruption of Vesuvius. They still looked as if their dwelling were in the midst of the dust and ashes, in a land where the walls are choked up with lava—where the earth breathes forth noxious vapours—and where, still more, ignorance is universal, and misery is accepted as the necessary state of the class to which they belonged. But these poor children were busy knitting; they could already spell easy words; they had been trained into some degree of discipline, and were learning obedience, and on the way to being taught honesty and decency. I also visited some other schools, under the guidance of one of the Evangelical party—or rather the Society for Neapolitan Evangelization. I saw three of the schools, one very recently opened and conducted by a Signor Barra, a most intelligent, energetic man, a lawyer, who gives his services gratis. He has invented a most expeditious system for teaching children to read in a few lessons, and this system seems admirably suited for the rapid genius of the children of the South. This school had been opened twenty-seven times. The little boys read words of four syllables, and pointed out all the chief cities of Europe, and showed on the map the triumphant itinerary of Garibaldi! A school for girls, taught by the Countess Stenboch, was a lovely specimen of a woman's (a superior woman's) influence, aided by music. It was touching to hear the words of Christian prayer and praise breathed out in sweet, low, and soft sounds by girls who, a year ago, scarcely knew their own names. Then there was another school in St. Pietro Majelli for about ninety boys from seven to fourteen years of age—the elder ones with their Bibles and "Pilgrim's Progress," the little ones being taught to spell and write by a former priest. I regretted much not having been able to attend any of the meetings for edification, which are attended by persons of all classes. In short, there is a movement, there is life; and if I might give advice to my English friends anxious to forward the good cause in the South of Italy, I should say, make a strenuous effort to raise funds for the opening and extension of these Evangelical schools in the city of Naples, and especially for carrying on the education of the most promising pupils, male and female, fitting them for schoolmasters and mistresses, acquainted with the best systems of instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic, as well as female work. The good to be done is immense, certain, immediate. The Government will neither interfere nor assist. The primary schools depend on the communes, who have already more than they are able or willing to do. There is room for all. The clergy are divided—the liberally-disposed begin to declare that the Bible is for all, that the people are to be educated, abuses reformed, &c.; the neri (the dark ones) are more furious than ever; but the people are not with them.

Literature.

MR. ROBERT YOUNG AND "EVANGELICAL CHRISTENDOM."

A FRIEND has sent us a circular of Mr. Robert Young, of Edinburgh, which contains some of the notices of the press on his "New Translation of the Bible." The following is an exact reprint of part of that circular which bears on our journal:—

Evangelical Christendom, Feb., 1862, writes: "As for the correctness of these works [of Mr. Young] we can say nothing, not having ever seen them; nor would they be worth examination, if we had them on our shelves, where we confess we have some useful works of Mr. Young! . . . We have never read greater caricatures of the Holy Word of God."

[The origin of these and similar remarks is found in the simple fact that Mr. Young was one of many who considered the notice of Mr. De Burgh's Commentary on the Psalms, which appeared in Evangelical Christendom in the course of 1860, to be a most unjust and unchristian personal attack on Mr. De Burgh. Mr. Young wrote to the editors of Evangelical Christendom regarding this subject, and the critic has never forgiven it. Hence this grief! From a communication received from Mr. De Burgh, it appears that the sole cause of offence arose from his having refused to take part in some proceedings of the Evangelical Alliance, and the critic, in his zeal for the Alliance, resolved "to compel him to come in" by an abusive review. Pity that a good cause requires such advocacy!]

It will no doubt occur to every reader of good breeding and good sense that the man who could write such a paragraph as the above is to be sincerely pitied rather than replied to. If there be anywhere any recognised organ of either secular or Christian literature which prostitutes the office of public journalist and critic to the purposes of personal spite in the manner in which Mr. Young's imagination conceives Evangelical Christendom to be conducted, it is beyond the sphere of our acquaintance. We do not believe in the existence of such an organ, except in the said imagination; but if his experience have been larger than ours in that direction, we do not envy him his felicity. We may, however, observe that the ingeniously-garbled extract from our review which Mr. Young has so curiously produced as a "puff indirect" for himself, exhibits us as writing self-contradictory nonsense rather too transparently to deceive even the dumbest of readers into the belief that we ever could have so penned it. The works of Mr. Young criticised or commented on by us were of two kinds—viz., his Biblical translations, which we had read and criticised; and his translations and transliterations of the "Song of a Finnish Country Girl," and of the "Shorter Catechism" into Hebrew, Hebrew-Samaritan, Chaldee-Samaritan, Chaldee, and Syriac, which translations we said we had never seen, nor cared to see, inasmuch as all those languages are in their classical type dead, and Hebrew-Samaritan and Chaldee-Samaritan are little else than Hebrew and Chaldee printed in the old Samaritan characters.

If our readers will refer for themselves to our reply (in the number for December, 1860) to Mr. Young's remarks on our critique on Dr. De Burgh, and on the Romanising of the Indian Alphabets, they will see with how much kindness and praise our censures were mingled. The same feeling of consideration actuated us in our remarks on his translation of Solomon's Song, and on several other occasions. But on examining Mr. Young's later translations—those of Job and of Genesis—we could not honestly forbear expressing our opinion that they tended rather to render the Word of God ridiculous than otherwise, and clearly proved Mr. Young's peculiar unfitness for the work of translating Scripture. Enough instances have been given in our previous numbers, and we may yet again return to this disagreeable subject.

As to Dr. De Burgh "having refused to take part in some proceedings of the Evangelical Alliance," we never heard of the fact, and, if true, it is a matter of utter indifference to us. We have no personal acquaintance with that gentleman whatsoever, and are concerned with none of his proceedings except his publications through the press. We reviewed his work impartially, but unfavourably, because we thought it a very inferior production; and we are still of the same opinion. Our article, therefore, contained no "personal attack" on Dr. De Burgh, unless to criticise a man's opinions and writings be personal. But as among the "Notices of the Press" which appeared on the cover of some numbers of Dr. De Burgh's work were several in which he was said to be one of the greatest Hebraists of the age, we considered it advisable to remark, that, though such might in the opinion of some be the case, we had been led to entertain a somewhat different opinion from a perusal of his "Hebrew Grammar" and his "Commentary on the Psalms." Other journals as well as our own have expressed a very unfavourable opinion of Dr. De Burgh's work—e.g., the Educational Times and The Church of England Monthly Review.

We may as well take this opportunity to repeat that the Evangelical Alliance is wholly irresponsible for what appears in our columns beyond that small portion printed officially (now once a quarter), under its special head. And, on the other hand, we are at perfect liberty to criticise and to dissent from the proceedings and publications of the Alliance itself, or of any of its members. Opinions may differ as to the length of severity to which a Christian critic ought to go in reviewing literary productions; and it may not be possible, in the hurry of composition, to attain at all times the exact measure and expression of "the more excellent way." But as we feel it to be essential to the interests of truth and literature to speak with perfect freedom, and without respect to persons, we shall not be deterred from doing so, according to the best of our judgment, either through deference to the sensitive over-tenderness of any Christian brethren, on the one hand, or through fear of the imputation of mean and spiteful motives by gentlemen of the calibre of Mr. Young.

Gotthold's Emblems; or, Invisible Things Understood by Things that are Made. By CHRISTIAN SCHRIEVER, Minister of Magdeburgh. 1871. Translated from the Twenty-eighth German Edition. By Rev. Robert MENZIES HODDAM. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. Hamilton, Adams, and Co.

WHILE we have imported more than enough, perhaps, of Germany's theological lucubrations in certain departments, we have (it is asserted in the preface to this book) translated only Bogatzky's "Golden Treasury," as the solitary specimen of her strictly devotional literature. Yet we are informed that she is rich in that class of works; and the present publication is offered as a specimen, "nearly two centuries old, but still instinct with the vigour and freshness of youth, which reappears like the spirit of a departed saint, and claims audience, while—in accents strangely sweet and solemn—it discourses to us of eternal things."

These emblems, or "Incidental devotions," are 366 in number, and one is adapted to each day of the year. They are many of them quaint and curious, many are beautiful, and all breathe a true spirit of piety; though they are somewhat extravagantly extolled when styled "a costly set of pure and genuine diamonds, each of them reflecting heaven." Let us, however, take one as a specimen—"The Child Learning to Walk"—which is such a diamond:—

"A child, just beginning to walk, was exercising its feeble steps with the help of chairs and benches, the mother meanwhile sitting at a little distance, and, with endearing words and a sight of the breast, enticing it to quit its hold and advance to her alone and unsupported. This at last it did, cautiously setting one foot before another, till it came within her reach, and then, in an ecstacy of delight, fell into her arms. Gotthold watched the scene with peculiar pleasure, and thought within himself, Most beautifully is the Divine training of my soul here shadowed forth! What else is my Christianity, but the timid tottering of this little one? What all my perfection, but imperfection felt and deplored? What my strength, but weakness? The Saviour, however, acts towards me the mother's part, attracts me with the sweet words of His promises, uncovers the breasts of His grace and everlasting consolations, and opens and extends to me His arms. Well, then, Lord Jesus, I will creep, if I cannot walk, and will hold by Thy word. When I stumble, Thou wilt support me; when I fall, Thou wilt extend to me the Cross, and help me to rise again, until at length I reach the place where Thou art, and with all my weaknesses, anxieties, and wants, cast myself into Thy bosom."

Conferences with God, in the Morning Hours of Every Day of the Year. By C. C. STURM, formerly Chief Pastor at St. Peter's Church, Hamburg. Literally translated from the last Remodelled Editions, published by Hahn, Hanover, 1855. Nisbet and Co. 1862.

In a manner entirely differing from "Gotthold's Emblems," noticed just above, we have here another valuable specimen of German devotional literature. The title "Conferences with God" sounds somewhat harsh in English; "Communings," perhaps, would express the German Unter hultengen more nearly, and would be better, if we might coin such a substantive out of the participle. (Gen. xviii. 33.) A meditation for every day of the year in the style of this book has, at sight, a certain air of heaviness and monotony; but, on perusal, we find considerable variety as well as beauty in the author's method of handling his subjects. And it is still more important to note that sound doctrine pervades these papers, no less than a highly-sanctifying and elevating devotional element. They are calculated indeed to edify Christians in the Divine life.

And if many such works as these be now introduced from Germany, it is not rash to prophesy that they will live in our language, and be popular with thousands of real and loving Christians for generations to come, when loads of theological and polemical rubbish will have been consigned to merited oblivion, with the rancorous and stupid controversies which gave it ephemeral importance.

The Spirit in the Word: Facts Gathered from a Thirty Years' Ministry. By W. WELDON CHAMPNEYS, M.A., Canon Residentiary of St. Paul's, and Vicar of St. Pancras. Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday.

MR. CHAMPNEYS, in the introduction to this little work, appeals to a principle frequently insisted on in our own pages—viz., the evidence for the Divine origin of the Bible which is supplied by its power in the world of mankind. "If that Book has not done in the world the works which no other book has done—if it has not exercised an influence which no other book has—if it has not effected changes in man's moral character—if it has not acted upon his conscience, awakening, enlightening, informing, disciplining it in a way which no other book has—if it has not preserved in their integrity, sustained in their obedience, upheld amidst all their difficulties, trials, and persecutions, myriads of the 'people of the Book'—then would men be less guilty in despising and rejecting it." This argument is well pursued and sustained. And as gold-seekers at the diggings are induced to search because others have sought and found gold before them, so every soul that has found the unsearchable riches of Christ in His Word is a witness and a warrant to others to come and do likewise. The publication before us consists of some two dozen short papers illustrative of this principle, gathered from the author's own experience. Many of the papers are rich in interest, and the whole from such a quarter could not fail to be profitable.

The Study of the Bible; a Series of Chapters, with an Introduction on Biblical Interpretation, and an Appendix on the Great Want of the Age. Interpreter Series. Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.

WHATEVER may be thought of this volume, in some respects, by those who, upon certain important points, differ from its author, we must acknowledge that it possesses the not too common merit of fully answering to its title. Some of the topics upon which it touches, indeed, are handled in a very different mode from that generally adopted, while others are introduced which are not usually to be met with in works of this kind; but none are irrelevant, and a serious, painstaking method and a conscientious spirit is apparent in the treatment of all. The author only glances at the question of the authority of Scripture, in which he assumes that his readers, like himself, believe; he eschews, on the one hand, dissertations upon the formation of the canon, the history of versions, and the like; and, on the other, such elementary formation respecting the ancient economy as is universally accessible; and after some trenchant remarks upon what he regards as prevalent errors in the present system of Biblical interpretation, he addresses himself to such questions as these: What is meant by inspiration? on special light from Heaven; on distinguishing between Scripture facts and human inferences; on bias as arising from personal and ecclesiastical interests, and from other causes; on the accommodation of Scripture; on perversions and exaggerations of Scripture; on typical and allegorical interpretations; and how helps may become hindrances. Such are a few of the topics discussed, and which indicate but imperfectly the wide range of the author's observations. One peculiarity which distinguishes him from other writers of books which at first sight might be classed with this is, that instead of viewing the Sacred Volume by itself, or only in connexion with the past, he considers it in relation to the present—to the individual believer and to the Church of Christ, in this second half of the nineteenth century. This brings him face to face with what he conceives to be errors of doctrine, perversions of primitive ecclesiastical order, and mistakes and departures from the teaching of Scripture in practical life. The volume contains much which commends itself to our best judgment and feelings, mingled with peculiar and novel views, from which we wholly dissent. Thus marred, as we deem it, are some otherwise beautiful and suggestive chapters (in the Appendix) on "the great want of the age"—this want being "a revival of spontaneous and intelligent personal agency for all the purposes of Christian charity, in place of hiring substitutes." To each chapter in the body of the work is appended an appropriate collect designed to promote its perusal in a devotional spirit. Some of these are from the Book of Common Prayer; others appear to be original. We have been struck by the fact that while again and again we have been compelled to differ from the writer in his teaching, we have not once been obliged to stand aloof from him in his petitions. Happily men may disagree even upon somewhat important points of doctrine and practice, and yet when they come to pray, find the same words most naturally and appropriately embody their common aspirations to their Father in heaven.

Practical Meditations on the First Three Chapters of the Apocalypse. Nisbet and Co.

THE chief point in this little book seems to be to make individual application of the warnings and promises to the Seven Churches of Asia. The writer thinks—an opinion, however, which is controvertible enough—that the Apostolic epistles address rather the Church collective; but that in these early chapters of the Apocalypse individuals are specially addressed by the Lord. The writer does not adopt the prophetic notion of Blunt and others. In most respects we find nothing very striking, and certainly nothing offensive to common-sense or good taste, in these pages. The praise is negative; but with the loads of rubbish continually vented on this topic, it is something for a reviewer not to have been disgusted.

Central Truths. By CHARLES STANFORD. Second Edition. Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

WE are glad to find that the merits of this volume, to which, on its first publication, attention was called in these pages, has been so far appreciated by the public, as to lead to the issue of a second edition. The author's sound theology, felicitous mode of illustration, and chaste and accurate diction, fully entitled his work to this mark of approval from those who, after all, constitute the ultimate tribunal of all criticism. Well would it be for society if the verdicts of that tribunal could be as fully justified in every case as in this. More utterances like these are required, both from the pulpit and the press.

The Fathers of the Wesley Family. By WILLIAM BEALE. Second Edition. Wm. Freeman.

BARTHOLOMEW WESTLEY was Rector of Charmouth, 1650—1660; and John, his son, was Vicar of Winterbourne-Whitechurch, 1658—1662; parishes in Dorset. The former was the great-grandfather, and the latter the grandfather, of the founder of Methodism. Both were ejected from their livings after the Restoration. Respecting the Rector of Charmouth Mr. Beale is able to tell us very little; of the Vicar of Winterbourne-Whitechurch we have a somewhat particular account. Among other facts of his personal history, we learn that he married a niece of the celebrated Dr. Thomas Fuller—a neighbour of his father's—and that although he painfully felt the operation of the Five Mile Act, and repeatedly suffered imprisonment for his sentiments, he was an occasional conformist. One object of the author is the erection of a chapel at Weymouth, almost within sight of which town the remains of John Westley, the ejected minister of Whitchurch, now lie wholly unnoticed. This proposed memorial is, of course, suggested by the occurrence of the bicentenary of the ejection.

The Junior Clerk; a Tale of City Life. By EDWIN HODDER. With a Preface by W. E. SHIPTON, Secretary of Young Men's Christian Association. Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

THIS tale, we are told by its author, is a fiction; the writer of the preface tells us, however, that "for every one of its statements he could supply a fact." The moral of the story is, that young men starting in business life in London require peculiar surveillance and help against besetting temptations, and that these helps are frequently lacking to them. The tale is at first a sad one; a fresh and virtuous and religiously-educated youth yielding to evil influences, wounding conscience, declining from the integrity of truth, and lapsing into the snares of infidelity and vice and exposure. But sorrow is turned into joy, the lost sheep is sought and found, and his latter end is far brighter than his beginning. The story is natural and powerful, and calculated to influence for good.

POETRY.

The Last Judgment; a Poem in Twelve Books. New Edition, Revised and Amended. London: Longman; Edinburgh: Nimmo.

The Distressed Queen; or, Triumphs of Grief. By G. ROCHFORD CLARKE. J. H. and J. Parker.

Tears Royal; or, A Nation's Grief; a Christian Monody, &c., on the Death of the Prince Consort. Hatchard and Co.

WE remember an eccentric old gentleman who, whenever he saw "poetry," in book or journal, used to exclaim "Pshaw, rot, rot, rotten." Whether he indulged any different feelings towards Shakespeare, Milton, and other true and immortal sons of song, we don't accurately know; but of a verity much rhapsody does issue from the press well calculated to excite some such splenetic criticism. A composition of twelve books in heroic rhyme upon such a subject as the Last Judgment, and boldly essaying "A Flight as lofty as the Eternal Throne," would demand a considerable amount of genius in the composer, or of patience in the reader, to be endurable. Vigorous versification and well-intended theology are no doubt meritorious qualities, but they do not constitute poetry. And while a dull sermon may perhaps be condoned on account of its sound tendencies, a dull poem will certainly not. The higher, too, the flight attempted, the greater must prove the failure; the grander the exordium, the more flat falls the abortive performance. Even Milton did not quite escape the perilous snare which is sure to ruin all inferior genius that rushes too boldly into the scenes and subjects demanding heaven's own inspiration to depict. There are, however, passages in "The Last Judgment" which show that in a less ambitious essay the author could exhibit poetical grace and feeling.

Of "The Distressed Queen," as well as of "Tears Royal," it is difficult to say anything without infringing upon the claims of sorrow on the one hand, or those of impartial criticism on the other. It is psychologically curious, however, to note how sober people will perpetrate, in the guise of versification, what in plain prose they would blush to do, or never dream of doing.

HYMNICIDE.—TOPLADY OR CHARLES WESLEY?

WE have received a long letter from "A Constant Reader" upon the subject of the hymn commencing "Christ whose glory fills the skies," which is designed by our correspondent to settle the question in favour of the authorship of Augustus Toplady. He says: "The hymn, as quoted by Miss Whately, is unquestionably the production of Mr. Toplady's poetic pen." He speaks of the "great error" of Mr. J. Montgomery, in attributing it to Charles Wesley; and he points out the difference between this hymn and that which appears in the Wesleyan Hymn Book, whose only likeness is in the first line of the first verse. "He that is first in his own cause seemeth just, but his neighbour cometh and searcheth him." And we have received a note from Mr. George John Stevenson, of the Wesleyan Times office, asserting, on the contrary, that this very hymn will be found in page 24 of Charles Wesley's "Hymns and Sacred Poems," published in 1740, the very year in the November of which Toplady was born. And

Mr. J. A. Eberle, of the Moravian Brethren's Church, at Woodford, near Daventry, writes to us to precisely the same effect. If the statement of these two gentlemen be correct, and there be no misconception, this, of course, would settle the question of the authorship of this hymn, so far as Toplady is concerned.

We have not the hymn-book of 1740 before us; but in the Wesleyan Hymn Book in ordinary use, with a preface by John Wesley, dated October, 1779, we find him stating that only a small part of the volume then published was by himself; and also that the former hymn-books compiled by him and his brother were "extracted from a variety of hymn-books." Supposing, therefore, that the hymn in question were even found perfect in print in 1740, this would not prove that Charles Wesley was the author, though it would prove that Augustus Toplady was not.

But there is more about this question which is worthy of investigation. The hymn, as it appears in Toplady's works, consists of three verses, as follows:—

A MORNING HYMN.

1. Christ, whose glory fills the skies,
Christ, the true, the only light,
Sun of Righteousness, arise,
Triumph o'er the shades of night.
Day-spring from on high be near,
Day-star in my heart appear.
2. Dark and cheerless is the morn,
Unaccompanied by Thee;
Joyless is the day's return,
Till Thy mercy's beams I see;
Till Thy inward light impart,
Glad my eyes and warm my heart.
3. Visit, then, this soul of mine,
Pierce the gloom of sin and grief,
Fill me, radiance Divine,
Scatter all my unbelief.
More and more Thyself display,
Shining to the perfect day.

The late Rev. Edward Bickersteth quoted this hymn accurately, as above, but attributes it to Charles Wesley. Other hymn-collectors have quoted it verbatim also, but attributed it to Augustus Toplady.

In the Wesleyan collection, hymn 531, we find the following:—

Christ, whose glory fills the skies,
That famous Plant Thou art;
Tree of life eternal rise
In every longing heart;

Bid us find the food in Thee
For which our deathless spirits pine,
Fed with immortality,
And filled with love Divine.

Two more verses follow, of eight lines each; but neither metre, nor subject, nor verse, has the slightest resemblance to the former hymn. This was pointed out by "A Constant Reader," mentioned above, in his letter to us.

But in the same Wesleyan collection we find a hymn, No. 156, which has escaped the notice of "A Constant Reader," and whose first verse is as follows:—

O disclose Thy lovely face,
Quicken all my drooping powers,
Gasps my fainting soul for grace,
As a thirsty land for showers;
Haste, my Lord, no more delay,
Come, my Saviour, come away.

Then, appended to this verse, are the second and third verses of the original hymn (attributed by us to Toplady); and nowhere in the Wesleyan collection do we find the first verse of that hymn, nor any portion of that first verse, except the single line, "Ohrist, whose glory fills the skies," which heads the hymn 531 of a totally different metre, style, and subject, as above quoted!

Query, therefore, did Charles Wesley write two hymns beginning with that line? This is not likely. Then who wrote the hymn 531, beginning with that line, and going on so differently, "THAT FAMOUS PLANT THOU ART?" And did Charles Wesley, or who did, write the hymn commencing "O disclose Thy lovely face!" or is that a combination of two or more different hymns?

To us it seems that the hymn, as quoted in full by us from Toplady's works, must be the original production, whoever wrote it. There is an unity throughout it, and a perfectness which belong to none of the others, and which stamp it as the work of a true poetic genius. If it be found, in this perfect shape, in print in 1740, of course it cannot be Toplady's. In such case it will be interesting to settle whether Charles Wesley wrote it himself, or compiled it only. And in any case, we have here a new illustration of the unhappy practice of hymnicide, which is as unjust to the authors of hymns, as it is generally detrimental to poetry, and injurious to the public.

Monthly Retrospect.

HOME.

THE grave has closed over the mortal remains of Earl Canning. His sun went down at noon; he had not completed his fiftieth year; and the prospect of a long, useful, and honoured life was before him: the highest offices of the State appeared to be within his easy reach. It was not to be. Like his predecessor, the Marquis of Dalhousie, he returned home from his stormy viceroyalty only to die. He has lived long enough, however, for his own fame; and his life, short as it appears, was, at any rate, long enough to enable him to render eminent service to the English Empire in India, and, through her, to the world. He was, perhaps, slow to recognise the greatness of the crisis at the first outburst of the mutiny; but when he once realised it, he never faltered in his course. At one time censured by those around him for over-lenity, at other times rebuked by his superiors for over-severity, he was not moved by either the one charge or the other, but continued calmly at his post, discharging his duty and perfecting his work. And when the mutiny was suppressed, he gave his sanction to reforms which staggered some of the most sanguine reformers by the boldness of their innovations; and which bid fair, at no distant day, to change the aspect of Indian society. On one point only—and that unfortunately the most important of all—he allowed himself to be trammelled by the associations of the old Indian Government—he gave no countenance to the religious education of the native children in the Government schools. Yet he was not actively hostile; and under his administration Christianity has made a progress, and taken a hold of the people, which it had never done before. Looking at his great qualities and his untimely death, we can only see how much England might have hoped for from him who lies buried in his grave.

Judgment has been delivered by Dr. Lushington, in the Court of Arches, on the "Essays and Reviews;" or, at least, upon two of the compositions in that volume—the essays of Dr. Rowland Williams, Vicar of Broad Chalke, and of the Rev. H. B. Wilson, Vicar of Great Staughton. As in the case of Mr. Heath, the learned judge refused to go into the meaning of Scripture, or the opinions of divines; but confined himself to a legal construction of the Articles of the Church of England, and to the consideration how far the opinions of Dr. Williams and Mr. Wilson impugned those Articles. Acting on this principle, he rejected a great many of the articles of accusation—that is to say, he acquitted the writers of heresy in holding them—that relating, for instance, to the authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Second Epistle of Peter, the Book of Daniel, the interpretation of the prophecies, &c., on which he said the writers might be right or wrong—sound or unsound—but in which they did not contradict any of the Articles of the Church. In the case of Dr. Williams, the general allegation, that "the tendency, object, and design of the whole Essay is to inculcate a disbelief of the Divine inspiration and orthodoxy of the Holy Scriptures, to deny the truth of parts thereof, and to deny the doctrines of original sin, justification by faith, atonement, propitiation, and the incarnation," is rejected by the Court as unprecedented, and as contrary to the fair rule established by the Judicial Committee in the case of "Burder v.

Heath"—viz., that the words or writings of the person accused must be pleaded; that the meaning which they are alleged by the prosecution to convey must be pleaded; and the particular Articles of Religion, or parts of them, asserted to be contravened, must be pleaded also. But the learned judge finds the declaration that "the Bible is an expression of devout reason" inconsistent with the twentieth Article, in which it is denominated "God's written Word." "Devout reason," says Dr. Lushington, "belongs to the acts and doings of man, and not to the works of the Almighty." This passage, therefore, he condemns. The declaration that "the Bible is the written voice of the congregation," although it is admitted to be "not a denial that the Bible is inspired," is declared to be contrary to the sixth and seventh Articles. The doctrine of propitiation put forward by Dr. Williams, according to which a merely subjective change, and not a new relation brought about by a mediatorial act, is signified, is condemned as contrary to the thirty-first Article, and similarly his doctrine of justification is declared to violate the eleventh Article.

In the case of Mr. Wilson, the doctrine contained in the fourteenth charge against him—that he teaches an intermediate state, and denies everlasting punishment—was condemned; as were the doctrines contained in two other charges, denying the inspiration of the Bible, and in the twelfth, denying original sin. These last articles of accusation were ordered to be reformed. The others were rejected. The judge did not pronounce sentence, but allowed both parties the right to appeal.

The International Exhibition is now in full operation; the whole of its wonders stand revealed to the eye of the visitor; its vast area is daily filled with crowds so vast, that they impede each other's progress; and the streets of London are choked with the influx of traffic and passengers. In this great gathering of the nations the friends of religion have not been idle. Clergymen have been employed, and services have been performed in almost every language in Europe. The Established churches and the Dissenting chapels have each been freely opened for the purpose: the German Chapel at St. James's was at once thrown open to the French and Germans; and the noble pile of Westminster Abbey was on one occasion crowded with an attentive audience, while Dr. Jeune, the Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge University, conducted the cathedral service, and delivered an impressive sermon in French. In all this we recognise a beautiful illustration of our insular stiffness bending to the Apostolic example of "becoming all things to all men." But that example was surely strained beyond all fair construction, in certain notices distributed at the doors—it was said, by members of the Church Union—attempting to show that there is no real difference between the Church of England and the Church of Rome—that the former Church holds in a modified form all the doctrines maintained by the latter. For this foolish and false assertion it is but right to say that the authorities of the Abbey were in no way responsible.

We noticed, a few months ago, the fearful outbreak of assassination that had taken place in Ireland, and, what was still more lamentable, the unwillingness of the general population to denounce the murderers. A special commission is now sitting to try the prisoners apprehended for these crimes, but the effect upon the population is doubtful. At Limerick the jury had no hesitation in returning a verdict of guilty against the prisoners. At Clonmel, on the other hand, they have acquitted prisoners in the face of positive testimony. It is true that evidence was brought forward equally positive on the other side; and the juries were bound to give the accused the benefit of any doubt they entertained. But here, again, it is painful to observe that the people, while they had no sympathy for the victims of these foul assassinations, went into a delirium of joy at the escape of the prisoners from the gallows. There is a principle of evil at the bottom of all this, which it is equally difficult to detect and to eradicate.

The Rev. John Burnet, of Camberwell, an eminent Dissenting minister among the Congregationalists, died last month, upwards of 70 years of age. He was a native of Perth, in Scotland; attended the ministry of the Rev. Mr. Orme there, who afterwards came to London, while Mr. Burnet became a Congregational minister in Cork. In 1839 he succeeded his old pastor in Camberwell, when Mr. Orme became Secretary of the London Missionary Society, and remained there till his death. He took an active part in political as well as religious questions, but he never forgot his ministerial character, and was respected and honoured through the whole of his long life.

FOREIGN.

The communication we publish this month from our French correspondent will be found to be of great interest. The attitude assumed by the clerical party in relation to the temporal power of the Pope must be embarrassing to the Government of the Emperor; but it does not appear to move him from his purpose, as the rumour is again revived of his intention to withdraw his troops from Rome. We in England, however, can make greater allowances for his hesitation and apparent oscillation when we see the mass of fanaticism with which he has to contend. What, indeed, is to be expected from a people who, as our correspondent describes, make the Virgin the supreme object of their worship, and endeavour to propitiate her with rites which, in all but licentiousness, are the mere counterpart of those which the old Pagans performed in honour of Venus? The wonder is, not that a reaction takes place here and there, as in Haute-Vienne, but that it is not more general. Their zeal, however, does not appear to take the form of pecuniary liberality.

The temporal power of the Pope is approaching a crisis, and no one is more aware of that than the Pope's advisers. To avert their threatened doom they have had recourse to a really ingenious manœuvre. The long-talked-of canonization of some seven-and-twenty Jesuit priests who were murdered upwards of 200 years ago by the Japanese has at last taken place; and bishops and other dignitaries of the Church, more in number than those that formed the Council of Trent, assembled at Rome to assist in the ceremony. Whether any or what effect, spiritual or secular, is anticipated from this presumptuous attempt to assign the honours of heaven, it is impossible to say; for the heart of man is as credulous as it is deceptive; but it is certain that the Pope, or rather Cardinal Antonelli, did not rely solely on this spiritual attempt to prop up his master's tottering throne. Advantage was taken of the presence of so many ecclesiastics, gathered from every state in Christendom, to obtain from them a declaration that the temporal power of the Papacy was necessary to the right administration of the Church's affairs, and that any person who attempted to deprive the Pope of that temporal power was, therefore, an enemy of the Roman Catholic Church, while the Pope himself, in what he calls an allocution, denounces—in language which, in any other lips, would be called intemperate vituperation—the conduct of all who have injured him as cheats, liars, and perjurers, the enemies of God and man. It is easy to see the effect which these men expect to produce upon the ignorant and priest-led portion of the population in France, Italy, and other countries, by denunciations coming from such high quarters. It is certain that the main hope of the friends of the Papacy now lies in disturbance being created in some quarter of Europe or another—they are not particular where.

In this council—for however disguised, it is nothing else—it is remarkable that the bishops of the German Romish Church make the least conspicuous figure. Cardinal Wiseman was prominent, so was Archbishop Cullen, of Ireland, so was Archbishop Dupanloup, of Orleans; but the Archbishop of Vienna did not attend at all, and the other German bishops, if they attended, took no prominent part. Our correspondent, writing from Frankfort, accounts for this by the altered position of the Romish Church in Austria, the virtual abrogation of the hated Concordat, and the liberties granted to the Protestants. We do not know that Italy herself is in a more interesting condition than Austria is at this time, whether considered in a religious or political point of view. It will be observed also that our correspondent rejoices in the political change taking place in Berlin and Hesse Cassel, for the remarkable reason that religion will now be dissociated from the cause of oppression, and that it will henceforth be possible to preach Jesus in Hesse, without being suspected of being a spy of the police. What a picture of the state of the country do these few simple words reveal to us! All our readers who remember the interesting correspondence between Dr. Dörner and the Bishop of Cork, which appeared in our February number, will rejoice that that profound and pious German theologian has been made Professor of Theology, and member of the Supreme Ecclesiastical Council at Berlin.

The Italian Parliament has voted an address to the King, refuting the claims put forth in the episcopal address to the Pope, and calmly asserting the right of Italy to her historical capital. The Government of the King has also replied to the whole Papal proceedings at Rome—as we learn from our Italian correspondent—in a more eloquent and significant manner, by cancelling all the petty prosecutions that were carried on at Florence against the Protestants, for the publication of tracts on the Romish controversy. Among the men who have profited by this liberal and enlightened measure, the best-known in this country is the eloquent Father Gavazzi. We have before explained that the people of Tuscany, though otherwise well affected to Italian unity, are unwilling to give up their code of laws, which, in secular matters, are more enlightened than those of Turin, while in ecclesiastical affairs they are most intolerant. Hence it happens that, in that particular portion of the Italian dominions, Protestants are still liable to persecution, which can only be averted—as in the present instance—by the exercise of the Royal prerogative. We heartily wish that an interchange of law may speedily take place, that the rest of Italy may adopt the Florentine secular law, and give her, in exchange, their spiritual. For other interesting notices of the progress of religion in that country, and especially for the efforts of our countryman, Mr. Henderson, of Park, to diffuse among the Italians an understanding of the scriptural idea of the Lord's-day, we refer to our correspondent's letter.

The propriety of the alliance between Church and State has been more warmly debated in this country in former years than it is at present. Those who take an interest in the question will now have an opportunity of watching the results of separation on a pretty large scale; for, as will be seen by the letter of our correspondent, the States of Holland have resolved to put an end to the alliance between the secular and the spiritual power in that kingdom. There are certain payments to be made both to Protestant and to Roman Catholic congregations, which they feel themselves bound in honour to continue, but no more will be added; and even in them the State declines henceforth to take any part in their internal organization, in earnest of which the office of Minister of Public Worship is abolished. The Dutch Churches will, therefore, be left free to demonstrate what is in them, without either the restraint or the patronage of the State. May the true Christian Churches of the land show that they understand their position and their responsibilities!

The deplorable war in America shows few symptoms of coming to a termination. The Federals have indeed made steady progress in the occupation of the principal towns of the South. New Orleans is theirs, and Corinth and Memphis: the whole vast length of the Mississippi, with the exception of the fortress of Vicksburg, is under the control of their gun-boats. Richmond is beleaguered, and Charleston has been attacked. So far, therefore, it would appear the subjugation of the Seceders is making rapid progress. There is, however, something to be said on the other side. The advance guard of General McClellan's army suffered a severe check before Richmond. General Banks was driven out of Northern Virginia, and General Fremont, hastening to his assistance, fell into an ambuscade, in which his army also suffered severely. But we set comparatively little store by the accounts of battles and sieges. Behind all these, there is the commanding fact that the Secession feeling is undiminished, that the Federals command no more than the range of their guns; and that as the strife goes on, union becomes every day more impossible, and the most malignant passions of our nature are more fully developed. A feeble voice is raised here and there for peace, but the cry is drowned as soon as heard by the mad shouts for victory, conquest, subjugation, and blood. The public debt increases at a fearful pace, and no one seems to think of making provision for its payment. The misery of the population is daily on the increase, and the demoralisation is such as we fear it will require many years to repair. It is seldom, however, that any movement is wholly evil. The war has had the effect of rousing the religious spirit of the North to regard slavery in a light which they never did before. We refer our readers to an interesting letter from Albany, in the State of New York, showing the rapid and decided conversion both of individuals and Churches to the opinion that slavery is an evil thing in itself, and that its existence lies at the root of the present rebellion.

SPANISH PROTESTANT PRISONERS.

Having learned that a demand had been made by the Spanish Government prosecutor for a still heavier sentence against Matamoros and his fellow-sufferers than even that which has already been pronounced, and against which an appeal has been made to a superior tribunal, and feeling how important it is that prayer should be made of the Church for their persecuted brethren, as was done for Peter when he was kept in prison, the Committee, as was stated in the last issue of Alliance intelligence, resolved to invite Christians of various countries to unite in earnest supplication on behalf of the Spanish prisoners and their unhappy country. Accordingly, an invitation to this effect was printed, naming Monday, the 21st of April, a suitable day for such a concert of prayer, and was extensively circulated in this and other countries.

Very many, we know, in Great Britain responded to this invitation, and remembering with much sympathy our Spanish brethren who are in bonds, cordially joined in earnest prayer in their behalf on the day above mentioned. The same was done in numerous places on the Continent. The following extracts, from communications since received on this subject, will, no doubt, be read with interest.

The first of these extracts evinces an amount of sympathy which might, perhaps, be expected from a people who have themselves been brought so recently into the enjoyment of religious liberty. It is as follows:—

Florence, 21st April, 1862.

A packet of an invitation of the Evangelical Alliance to special prayer on behalf of Matamoros and his fellow-sufferers in Spain, &c., has been received by me. I communicated with the Rev. Mr. O'Neill, the British chaplain, who assented to the proposed meeting being held in the Ante-Camera of the English Church. I have just returned from the meeting. At twelve o'clock, the hour fixed, the numbers were so great, principally of Italians, that the Ante-Camera would not hold them, so the church entrance was opened, and all flocked in, and the church was filled with a very large Italian congregation. Mr. O'Neill commenced with a few prefatory remarks, and read your printed invitation, which my son afterwards translated into Italian. Mr. O'Neill then called on Signor Geymonat, the Vaudois minister, who spoke with much feeling, read a portion of Acts x., and prayed. Signor Gualtierie, the ex-priest who ministers in the Italian Church, spoke and read with deep feeling the latter part of Rom. xv.—“Whosoever I take my journey into Spain,” &c. Dr. Bethune, from America, was next called upon; and though he spoke and prayed wholly in English, there was so much spiritual life in what he said, that it affected the Italians. Dr. Revel followed with a few words, and then Signor Magrini, who also ministers in the Italian Church, spoke and prayed in the same spirit of deep sympathy, strong faith, and earnest affection. Mr. O'Neill added a few excellent observations, and concluded with a scriptural blessing, which my son, who was at his side, translated. Such a meeting has never been held in Italy; all distinctions vanished in one belief of the truth and in one-hearted fellowship with the sufferers, agreeing together to call upon the Lord, in full assurance that prayer would be answered. Thus were there many with one accord in one place; though, beyond my writing two or three notes of invitation, no direct means were employed to convene a large assembly. At the conclusion two policemen came in to know what it was all about, and, as they went away, they smiled and said that if our religion was to be judged of by good order and good government, we had much the advantage of them.

The next extract is from a correspondent in Holland:—

Amsterdam, 21st April, 1862.

Your touching appeal of the 6th of this month has been responded to to-day. In the French Church the minister engaged the congregation in a fervent prayer, with supplications for the Spanish prisoners, and in which the Spanish authorities were not forgotten. A prayer-meeting was held in the building of the Free Church of Scotland's mission, and we may trust that many supplications have been sent up to the Throne of Grace of which we shall hear, and many of which we shall not hear—at least in this world. Allow me to express a hope that the efforts of the Evangelical Alliance may have such success as will be most to the glory of our Lord, and that His blessing may rest on all its works. . . .

The following extract is from Denmark, and is dated "Easter Monday":—

It was a happy thought of the Evangelical Alliance to suggest special prayer for the Spanish prisoners on this day, the usual portion of Scripture for this, the second Easter-day, being the 10th chapter of the Acts. I had the gratification of bringing the subject before a very large congregation who were assembled in my church. . . .

We have in the Danish Church a beautiful prayer in which we pray for "all who are exiled, imprisoned, or bound for confessing Thy name, O Lord, or for any other righteous cause."

I write these lines to you, that you may know that we here also have joined in the movement commenced by you in favour of Matamoras and his brethren, and I do not doubt that in many ways this sacred cause will lie near the hearts of Danish Christians.

Christianstad, 18th April, 1862.

I have received the appeal for united prayer on April 21, and will make it known to my friends in the neighbourhood. We will not forget to unite our prayers with yours for our Spanish brethren. I forgot to tell you that in many localities prayer was offered up in Sweden in the first week of this year for the same object. Also in my own parish we prayed together at the annual tract meeting in that week, when brethren from forty or fifty parishes were assembled here. Please give my best respects to the President of the Evangelical Alliance in England. . . . The Evangelical Alliance will do more good than the men of our age can understand. You may be assured that a very great struggle about the Church is now going on in Sweden. It would seem that the next Diet will be compelled to give increased liberty to both the National Church and Dissenters. I rejoice to see that fanaticism cannot succeed in our land; the principles of the Evangelical Alliance are too well known for that to be possible.

Similar letters have been received from Hungary, the Rhine Provinces, the Danubian Principalities, Berlin, Petersburg, &c. At the last-mentioned place we hear that in almost all the Evangelical churches prayer was offered in behalf of the Spanish prisoners.

LETTER FROM MATAMOROS.

The subjoined letter, addressed to General Alexander by Matamoras, cannot fail to touch the hearts of the Christian readers of it with deep sympathy for him in his trials, and with thankfulness to the God of all grace and consolation, who keeps His suffering servant steadfast in the faith, and comforts him in all his tribulation. It is preceded by a few statements and observations by the General, who says:—

I have omitted some passages in the letter which are personal to myself.

With regard to the Duke of Tetuan, I can but repeat what I wrote to Matamoras, and have told every inquiring friend—English and foreign—that nothing could be more gratifying than the frankness and courtesy of his manner and the plainness of his speech. Although he gave no promise, and held out no other hope than that the request I had preferred and the papers I had presented might be again considered at some future time, yet there was that in his refusal which emboldens me to cherish the inference that his decision was pronounced in accordance with the exigencies of his high position as Prime Minister of Spain, with reference to a case still before the Courts, rather than from the private dictates of his own heart and mind. Whether in drawing this inference I was right or wrong must, in a short time, be proved. Unless some occult influence is permitted to retard the sentence of the Court, Matamoras must soon be acquitted or condemned. Not only Christendom, but the whole world, waits with impatient deference upon the observance of the legalities which Spain is still submissive to suffer under; but if the result should be such that humanity shudders to contemplate as possible, then let us evoke that mighty power of universal Christian opinion and moral power before which the persecuting priesthood of Rome shall quail, and which may, in God's good providence, be the means of emancipating Spain from its present thralldom, and leaving such men, as I yet hope and humbly trust the Duke of Tetuan will prove himself to be, free to follow out the only policy that can be congenial to generous hearts and enlightened minds, when priestcraft and superstition shall be trampled in the dust.

The following is the letter:—

Prison of the Audiencia, Grenada,

May 8, 1862.

Honoured and much-beloved Brother in our Divine Redeemer, Jesus Christ, our comfort, life, and hope,—Some time since I had the unspeakable joy of receiving your valued and edifying letter, full of such comforting hope in Jesus, and of touching and important Christian instruction.

Had it not been for the weak state of my health, which is now worse than ever, I should have replied to your communication before. This, to my regret, has been the cause of my delay, but as I feel somewhat better to-day, I will take advantage of this opportunity.

I see in your letter the same Christian magnanimity which brought you to Spain, to see if you could succeed in bringing consolation to so many families. The Lord in His infinite mercy and wisdom will do justice to your motives, and will reward so much love, faith, and Christian sympathy, though the Duke may not do it. But it matters little; the ways of the world and its justice are not the justice and the ways of God.

However, my heart tells me, to my very great comfort, that the Lord has blessed your desires and Christian efforts. Yes, beloved brother, yes, I can assure you that I observe with joy the effect produced by your Christian course. It has produced a profound and hopeful impression upon the Spanish people—an impression which has already been followed by great results, and will be followed by still greater ones. Public opinion has done justice to your noble and Evangelical spirit, and your worthy attitude has been the object of frequent favourable comments, and thus I have abundant comforting evidence that your Christian mission has not been unavailing.

What does it matter whether the Duke of Tetuan has acceded to your supplications and to those of so many saints? Certainly nothing at all, for a triumph has been gained far greater than I ever expected.

Dear brother, I understand your grief at our sufferings among criminals, in dirty prisons, where we drag on our existence; but is it not a great consolation that we suffer for so holy a cause, and for the Divine name of our Redeemer?

It is true my physical strength declines rapidly. I do not know whether I shall succumb in this prison or in the galleys; but if this should not be, and I should regain my liberty, I know that I shall not recover my health—it is gone for ever. Yet I can assure you most sincerely, that I am very happy—supremely happy—in my sufferings, for the sake of the sweet name of Jesus; and I cannot imagine greater happiness than that of having part in the sufferings of Christ. These sufferings do not bow me down; on the contrary, they form the most beautiful part of my Christian joy. My health is declining fast; but even if death should be near—very near—I would meet it with joy—with great joy in Jesus: I should be happy, and say with the Apostle, "To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain."

The definitive sentence of the Tribunal may be pronounced any moment; however, dear brother, hard and horrible as this my sentence may be, nothing troubles me, nothing shall ever trouble me; and should it fall upon me to-morrow, the sentence of man cannot interfere with my Christian joy and happiness in Jesus. It cannot deprive me of this, for my faith makes me happy, and the consolations of the Holy Ghost cause me to rejoice.

Christ, that He might give us life, suffered the chastisement of the guilty sinner. My eyes are fixed upon Golgotha, and when I see that for my love to Jesus I have to undergo the cruel sufferings of a criminal—when I see that on my humble person is vented greater hatred than on those criminals, who spread terror and blood among whole families—I render infinite thanks to the Lord, that He has granted me, not only the happiness of believing in Him, but also of suffering for Him. However, I must close this letter. I will remember what you told me about the Duke of Tetuan. I not only approve your proceeding, but also congratulate you and myself on the good results which your noble and Christian mission has produced, and which become every day more manifest to my beloved country.

I am sorry the state of my health has not allowed me sooner to reply. I repeat my assurance to you, that I felt great delight at receiving your letter; and if you could write to me again, I need not say how extremely happy it would make me. Again assuring you of my eternal Christian gratitude, I pray God that He may grant you peace and mercy, and that He may pour out upon you the precious gifts of His Holy Spirit.—Yours humbly in the Lord,

MANUEL MATAMOROS.

RELIGIOUS CONTROVERSIES.

The ADDRESS issued by the Committee in March last to the members of the Evangelical Alliance, "urging upon their prayerful attention the fundamental principles of their union, and the duty of watchfulness over their own spirit, especially in reference to the ecclesiastical controversies of the times," has been extensively circulated, and it has besides been republished, in whole or in part, in many newspapers and in some literary periodicals. This Address, copies of which may still be had on application to the secretaries, correctly describes, as the Committee believe, what should freely be conceded by brethren in Christ on the points on which they differ, and what ought not to be required of them; so that, on the one hand, they may "seek," as every Christian is bound to do, "to hold the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace;" and, on the other, that they may be left, honestly and without compromise, to maintain their religious convictions. In addition to this effort to prevent the risk of alienation and bitterness, the Committee, feeling that the great resource of Christians in time of danger is in prayer to God, resolved upon holding public meetings for united prayer with reference to this subject. Accordingly, on the 30th of May, two such meetings took place at Freemasons' Hall, London.

The morning meeting was presided over by Sir C. E. Eardley, Bart. It was commenced by the singing of a suitable hymn, and the reading, by the Rev. E. Mannerling, of the 14th chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, which was followed by prayer by the Rev. F. Tucker. Short extracts were read from the letters of several persons, who, though unable to be present, expressed their sympathy with the object of the meeting, and, among others, a communication was read from the Rev. Dr. Marsh, who said that it would have been a joy to him to have attended a meeting which was "in unison with the most wonderful prayer that ever ascended from the earth" (John xvii.).

The Chairman then read a brief statement prepared by the Committee, with the view of preventing the possibility of their being misunderstood in convening these meetings. The statement is inserted here, the Committee being wishful to propagate the principles which it contains:—

STATEMENT

Read at Meetings for Special Prayer, with reference to the present Ecclesiastical Controversies, held in Freemasons' Hall, May 30th, 1882.

It is no design of this meeting to stop controversies. The sole object is, that controversy, when it becomes necessary, should be so conducted as not to separate brethren.

The work of the Evangelical Alliance is to cement the divinely-instituted union of God's children of all lands and sects. It does this, positively, by leading them to united prayer, united action for common objects, and occasional assemblies—national or general. It does so no less, negatively, by seeking to prevent those offences which divide believers.

By its fundamental principles—adopted, it may truly be said, with the approval of the Evangelical Christians of all countries, in 1846—it requires from its members, "in their conduct, and especially in the use of the press, to abstain from bitterness, wrath, anger, clamour, and evil speaking, with all malice."

At the beginning of this current year, apprehensive that matters of controversy now rife in our country might expose its members to the danger of neglecting this obligation, the Evangelical Alliance issued a paper, urging on its friends to be more than ordinarily upon their guard on the subject.

There was one measure, however, which, up to this time, it had not adopted. The omission it is the object of the meetings of this day to supply. The meetings of this morning and this evening are called for prayer—prayer to Almighty God that brethren may not be permitted to become alienated by the controversies of the day. It is hoped that, in answer to prayer, a spirit of Divine wisdom, as well as of Christian love, may be bestowed, and that thus good men, who would not willingly violate any of God's precepts, may be increasingly impressed with the true principles which ought to regulate Christian controversy.

The Committee of the Evangelical Alliance the more desire prayer on this subject because they are deeply convinced that, without Divine assistance, right views and feelings are far from easy of attainment on both sides of the controversies now going on. There are such things as undue vehemence in debate, hasty imputations of unworthy motives, intrusion into the domain of conscience, and a denial of Christian integrity to brethren with whom we differ. On the other hand, there is such a thing as unduly restraining liberty of speech—exacting, as a condition of Christian affection, that our brethren shall say nothing which can offend our habits or our principles. The Evangelical Alliance protests equally against both extremes. It claims for its members and its friends that liberty of speech in things religious and ecclesiastical which it is the right and duty of every Christian to exercise for the benefit of the whole Christian community. At the same time, it demands that this liberty shall be without license. While it claims the use, it deprecates the abuse.

In closing, let it be distinctly noted, that Christian union is steadily on the increase. Occasional outbreaks of party spirit are no proof to the contrary. There is a far larger measure of generosity among Christians than formerly existed, and the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance have the strong persuasion that, in answer to earnest prayer, the very endeavour of Satan to sow the seeds of discord will be overruled for good, by bringing about a greater amount of mutual confidence, affection, and respect, than has hitherto prevailed among the disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ.

7, Adam-street, Strand, London, W.C.

Prayer was subsequently offered by the Rev. A. S. Thelwall, General Alexander, Rev. W. Tyler, and Rev. T. Nolan.

In the course of the meeting two short and suitable addresses were delivered by the Rev. W. Pennefather, Barnet; and the Hon. and Rev. B. W. Noel.

At the evening meeting the chair was taken by the Right Hon. Lord Radstock. The 17th chapter of St. John's Gospel was read by Dr. G. H. Davis, and the devotions were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Weir, Captain Fishbourne, R.N., Rev. W. Bevan, and Rev. W. M. Bunting; and appropriate addresses were delivered by the Rev. Aubrey C. Price and Rev. J. Stoughton.

VISIT OF FRANCESCO MADIAT.—At a meeting of the Committee of Council, on the 5th of June, Signor Madiat was introduced to the Committee. It is well known that he and his wife, Rosa Madiat, were a few years since, by the combined efforts of the Evangelical and Protestant Alliances, liberated from imprisonment, to which they had been condemned for the Gospel's sake. Francesco expressed the sincere gratitude which, he said, he still strongly feels towards the Evangelical Alliance for this successful effort on behalf of his wife and himself, and he stated that he daily remembers the Alliance in his prayers. He gave an account of the meetings held in Florence, in April last, for united prayer on behalf of the persecuted brethren in Spain; and in reply to inquiries put to him by the chairman, Colonel Walker, who has himself recently visited Italy, interesting information was obtained of the state of religion in Florence. In referring to the case of Matamoros and his fellow-sufferers, Madiat, as might be expected, manifested a strong feeling of sympathy with them. One who has himself been bound with the chain of persecution can feel as none others can for brethren in the Lord who are now suffering bonds and imprisonment for the sake of their religion.

FOREIGN CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

Our readers will be interested in learning that this committee, which, though an independent committee, was originated by the Evangelical Alliance, is pursuing its important labours in the full spirit of the Alliance, and with evident proofs of the Divine favour. It entered upon its work, for which it had for some months been making preparation, with special prayer for the guidance and blessing of God; a meeting for united prayer for this object having been held on the day of the opening of the International Exhibition. The meeting took place in the large room, Freemasons' Hall, and was very numerously attended. The Earl of Shaftesbury presided.

The means of usefulness employed by the committee are as follows:—

1. Preaching in various Continental Languages.—Hitherto from eight to twelve services have been held in the Royal German Chapel, the Royal Military Chapel Wellington Barracks; Trinity Episcopal Chapel, Conduit-street; Marylebone Presbyterian Church, Eccleston Chapel, the Swiss Chapel, and other places, every Sunday—conducted in the German, French, Italian, and Swedish languages, by foreign pastors, who have been brought over to England by the committee for that purpose. The attendance, except on a very wet day in last month, has been very satisfactory; and the congregations have consisted principally of the persons for whose benefit the services were intended.

2. Employment of City Missionaries and Colporteurs.—These valuable agents meet every morning at the offices in Freemasons' Hall, for prayer, which is offered in different languages, after which they go forth—like the first disciples, “by two and two”—to the railway-stations, the parks, Exhibition, Crystal Palace, and, on Saturdays, to the Houses of Parliament, and to other places where foreigners are to be found in numbers. They keep a journal of their work, which contains deeply-interesting details, and shows already most blessed fruits of their prayerful and energetic labours. They seek for opportunities of speaking to visitors from the Continent on the subject of religion, and they distribute religious tracts, and dispose by sale of the sacred Scriptures in foreign languages. A most marked success has attended this latter department of the work of the colporteurs, who have sold large numbers of Bibles, especially in the German language. Surely such sowing, by the side of all waters, of the incorruptible seed will be followed by much fruit which shall be gathered to life eternal. It should also be mentioned that, among the rest, are two female missionaries, speaking the French and German languages, who are zealously labouring as agents of the committee. Another means of usefulness employed by the committee is this: In order to draw together especially natives of France, meetings for general conversation are held at Freemasons' Hall every Friday evening, at which M. Napoleon Roussel presides.

It is gratifying to see how the different established societies, whose work this committee in some respects supplements during this special season, cordially assist them in their operations. The London City Mission has placed at the disposal of the committee a number of foreign missionaries and colporteurs, who, as well as others engaged by the committee, are conversant with the French, Italian, and German languages. The Religious Tract Society has made the committee a grant of foreign tracts to the amount of 50l., and has kindly promised more when needed.

The British and Foreign Bible Society supply the committee, at cost price, with as many copies of the Scriptures in foreign languages as may be required.

GENEVA CONFERENCE VOLUME.—With the aid of a few liberal friends of the Alliance, the Committee have purchased from the Publishing Committee 100 copies of the volume containing a report of the Geneva Conference, with a view of presenting them to distinguished individuals and public libraries. Her Majesty the Queen has graciously signified her willingness to receive a copy.

WEEK OF SPECIAL PRAYER, 1863.—An invitation for prayer during the week January 4—11, 1863, prepared, at the request of the committee, by their venerable friend, the Rev. Dr. Marsh, will shortly be published.

INTERCOURSE OF FOREIGN AND BRITISH CHRISTIANS.

Besides opportunities for intercourse between the foreign visitors and British Christians afforded by several meetings in private residences, two more general opportunities have recently been given to many of our English friends to meet the brethren from the Continent, and to hear from them statements of any remarkable facts connected with the progress of the Gospel in continental countries. One of these was on occasion of Sir C. E.

Eardley inviting a number of friends interested in foreign evangelization to meet at dinner in Freemasons' Hall, on the 16th of June, the Bishop of London and the foreign pastors. About 120 guests assembled, among whom, besides the foreign pastors then in London and other foreign Protestants, were the Bishops of London, Rochester, and Jerusalem, the Earl of Chichester, Lords Calthorpe and Radstock, Sir Harry Verney, M.P., Hon. A. Kinnaird, M.P., Edward Baines, Esq., M.P., General Sir Rowland Eustace, Archdeacon Brown, Revs. E. Hawkins (Gospel Propagation Society), Prebendary Burgess, J. D. Glendon (Christian Knowledge Society), J. Stoughton, J. Povah, A. W. Thorold, Capel Molyneux, J. W. Reeve, S. B. Bergne, Dr. Jobson, A. R. C. Dallas, W. Arthur, E. H. Bickersteth, General Alexander, Major Straith, &c., &c.

Addresses were delivered successively by Sir Culling Eardley; Pastor Coulin (Geneva), who referred to the blessed effects of the late Conference in Geneva; Rev. Dr. Krummacher (Potsdam), Chaplain to the King of Prussia; Pastors Beskow (Stockholm), Armand Delille (Paris), Meille (Turin), Signor Mazzarella (Genoa); and the Bishops of London, Jerusalem, and Rochester.

The other opportunity referred to for fraternal intercourse was a public one, afforded by the holding of a soirée, arranged by the Committee of the Evangelical Alliance, and which took place on the 19th of June. Tea and coffee were served in an ante-room at Freemasons' Hall, after which the guests assembled in the large room for conversation and addresses. The following are a few of the large number of persons present: Pastors Armand Delille, Napoleon Roussel (France), Dr. Revel, Pastor Meille, Professor Mazzarella, Signor Ferretti (Italy); Professor Strauss, Pastors Fleiderer, Kühner (Germany), Du Pontut, E. Barde (Switzerland), Beakow, F. T. Carlson, Dr. Rothlieb (Sweden); Sir Harry Verney, Bart., M.P.; Generals Sir J. Rowland Eustace, Alexander, Clarke, Fenning; Captains Trotter and Layard; Hon. S. B. Curzon; Revs. Daniel Wilson, A. R. C.

Dallas, R. W. Greaves, Dr. Angus, J. S. Jenkinson, A. S. Thelwall, John Gill, M. Thomas, Dr. Spence, W. Vincent, R. Ashton, R. S. Ashton, P. W. de Quetteville, H. B. Clissold, William Bevan, W. Arthur, John Ross, W. Wickes, Francis Tucker, Professor Hoppus, Carr J. Glyn, John Pulling, Dr. Campbell, Dr. Fry, F. Trestail, John Trestail, P. La Trobe, and J. Shedlock; Messrs. Robert Baxter, W. R. Ellis, Herbert Mayo, R. N. Fowler, H. Carre Tucker, Henry Roberts, W. H. Warton, W. M'Arthur, Edward Corderoy, Charles Roberts, Josiah Foster, C. T. Gabriel, John Hoyes (Torrisdale Castle), and A. Steedman; Drs. Davis, Crawford, Stewart, and Bernard; and Mr. Alderman Oldham (Macclesfield).

At a quarter to eight o'clock the Hon. A. Kinnaird, M.P., one of the vice-chairmen of the Council, took the chair, when the following proceedings commenced. The hymn beginning—

Come, let us join our cheerful songs
With angels round the throne, especially appropriate for the occasion, was first sung; after which John xvii. (the prayer of our Lord for the union of His disciples) was read by the Rev. J. Pulling, and prayer was offered by the Rev. W. K. Jamieson, British Chaplain at Amsterdam, who, in the course of it, fervently prayed for the Spanish brethren who are in bonds.

The Hon. A. Kinnaird then delivered the introductory address, bidding a hearty welcome on behalf of the Evangelical Alliance. The present meeting, he said, reminded him of the assemblies which met on the formation of the Alliance in 1846, to the influence of which he attributed much of the increase of the spirit of Christian union since manifested.

Pastor Napoleon Roussel, of Cannes, then addressed the meeting in French, and urged upon his audience the importance of the country of France as a sphere of missionary labour.

Professor Strauss, of Berlin, followed, who spoke of the progress of a revival of religion in Germany generally, and especially in Prussia, among the younger clergy and the professors at the University. This revival, he said, which was penetrating to the people, began from the throne, owing much to the Christian influence of the late King, Frederick William. He gracefully alluded to the Crown Prince and the Princess — "Your Princess Royal," he said, "and our Princess Royal"—as resident in his parish, and as often attending his church. He could bear testimony to them as true examples of a pious and happy marriage. He then proceeded to acknowledge how much Germany owed to England, and to the Bible Society, for the promotion of religious life and activity.

The Rev. H. Schmettau then read the following translation of a letter, addressed to him by the Rev. Dr. F. W. Krummacher (author of "Elijah the Tishbite"), who was detained in Ireland, and unable, as he had intended, to be present at the meeting:—

Dublin, June 18, 1862.

Dear Brother Schmettau,—I regret exceedingly that I cannot be present at the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, announced for to-morrow evening.

Most heartily do I wish that I could have raised my voice with that of the brethren, to proclaim emphatically at the present time, when anti-Christianity hastens to its full maturity, the necessity of a closer union of all those who still stand by the banner of our crucified Emanuel.

I should also have pressed upon our brethren the increasing necessity of such an active manifestation of brotherly oneness in the faith of the Gospel, as would openly show itself to the world.

We cannot too loudly and too often proclaim to those who are like-minded with ourselves, that the time has come for awakening from the sleep of security, and for lowering our little party colours before the Divine Imperial standard.

May the brotherly meeting of to-morrow be the means of inducing some one eminently gifted and qualified for the purpose to write a short paper setting forth in a clear light to the children of God throughout the world the signs of the times, and appealing to their heart and conscience as to what is now above all things most needful.

Such a paper would, at the present moment, be most opportune. Ask your dear chairman what he thinks of it, and give him the kindest regards of Lord Roden as well as of myself.

Yours most cordially,

F. W. KRUMMACHER.

The Rev. Dr. Revel, Moderator of the "Vandois Table," next addressed the meeting. He dwelt on the position of the Waldensian Church, and its importance at the present time in Italy, pointing out the remarkable dealings of Providence in preserving that Church, as it were, for the present occasion, when that country is thrown open to the Gospel.

Professor Mazzarella, of Genoa, then delivered an eloquent address in Italian, which was translated with great effect by the Rev. W. Arthur. The speaker confined his remarks to the work of God in Italy at the present time, and the great Gospel principles on which efforts for its promotion should be undertaken and sustained; and in the course of his address paid a warm tribute of gratitude to the Waldensian Church, to whose testimony, so long borne, on behalf of religious liberty, its establishment in Italy, he observed, was so greatly owing. Evangelization, he said, was a proof of love to Christ, and the highest duty of Christians. The very strength of evangelistic effort consisted in feeling the love of Christ towards men. Pecuniary means were an external instrument, but the true strength of the work lay in the principle of love to God. He with much earnestness besought his hearers, and through them others of God's people in this country, to pray that the Italian evangelists might feel that love more and more deeply in their own hearts. It was this, and not open controversy against the Papacy, which would shake the power of the Church of Rome. He deprecated the mixing up of politics with efforts to spread the Gospel. It might have been easy, by a certain political line of action, to bring about an illusory reformation; but the Italian evangelists felt that it was only by making Christ known that souls could be saved. Christians had opposed to them a colossal power; but let them look, not around them, but above, to Him who sits at the right hand of God. Evangelism aimed at the conscience—not the Italian conscience merely, but the human conscience. It sought not Italians, but men in Italy, to convert them to God. The Gospel ought ever to be preached; and if it did not always convert men, it would always bring glory to God in Christ. This, he said, was the moment to preach in Italy to the conscience, and then the true Church would be formed there, and those that witnessed it would see that it was formed, not on ancient traditions, but by the hand of God, on the foundation of His own living Word; and so they would be constrained to give God the praise.

At this stage of the proceedings the Chairman suggested that it would be appropriate if those present would unite in special prayer for the country which was represented by the last two speakers. Accordingly, special prayer for Italy was offered by the Rev. D. Wilson, Vicar of Islington.

Afterwards addresses were delivered by Pastor Beakow, of Stockholm (who gave some account of the revival in Sweden), Pastor Armand Delille, of Paris, and the Rev. W. Arthur.

The Doxology was then sung, and the Benediction was pronounced by the Rev. P. La Trobe.

Thus terminated a meeting of remarkable interest, and during the proceedings of which those present must have felt that, whatever diversities may exist among God's people, in language and country, and on some forms of worship, there is yet one body and one Spirit, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in all.

Lists of New Members and Monies are omitted for want of space.

THE PULPIT OF THE DAY.*

THE difference between criticism and performance is wonderful, and the distance immense. Nothing is more easy than to snarl and sneer. Not very difficult, either, is it to fault-find, whether soberly and earnestly, or ostentatiously and grandiosely, with genuine sincerity, or malicious candour. But to construct something positively excellent is as different a matter as is the difference between planning and erecting an elegant temple, and beating it down, carved work and all, with axes and hammers. In the present day we hear much of what are called "pulpit platitudes;" but not a little might also be said about those platitudes of another kind which are hurled against the pulpit by divers parties.

It is true that the wearer of a shoe need not be a shoemaker in order to be a sufficient judge of a comfortable fit. A hearer may be a competent critic, without any talent for preaching. And to be disgusted by a miserably bad sermon, or to be pleased and instructed by a brilliant and excellent one, is within the range of every ordinary capacity and experience. But, notwithstanding a good deal lately alleged to the contrary from many opposite quarters, we incline to think it probable that as well brilliant excellence, as disgusting incompetence, are now and always the exceptions, and are not the average or rule in this matter. Or if this be liable to be controverted, we should then be inclined to ask, at what period of history were matters very different or very much better? It will not do to select a few names of giants—of Primitive, or Reformation, or Puritan, or Methodist, or other conspicuous periods—whose reputations have come down to us, while their tens of thousands of unknown and unheard of respective contemporaries are ignored. We knew an old clergyman of the last generation (and one not very fastidious, either, on this subject) who declared that, in his younger days, you might ride from the Land's End to London without hearing one sermon that could be listened to. We know, also, how Bishop Horsley spoke openly in his charges of clergy of his place and time, as "Apes of Epictetus," and as "infidels in masquerade." Without question things have generally improved since then.

How easy it is to prescribe and to theorise, both negatively and positively. A sermon ought to be neither too short nor too long. It ought not to be exclusively doctrinal nor exclusively hortatory. It ought to address the intellect as well as the affections; and the affections as well as the intellect. It ought not to be flat, tame, dull, and prosaic; nor flighty, figurative, metaphysical, rhetorical, rhapsodical. It should neither compose men to sleep, nor inflict pain, nor excite too intensely. It ought not quite to ignore the ipsissima verba of the Holy Scriptures, nor to be interlarded and crammed with superabundant texts. It should not soar above the capacity of the most illiterate and vulgar hearer, nor be too humble for the taste of the most educated and refined. In fact, it should exquisitely hit the nail on the head; and that neither too softly nor with superfluous energy. It should be just the thing! Addressed also to a mixed congregation of baptized and still reprobate sinners, and of truly pious spiritual Christians, it should avoid giving offence or wearisomeness to the natural man, and yet not leave the hungry sheep unfed. The fastidious critic, seeking an intellectual stimulus, and the soul of the simple, seeking instruction in wisdom and righteousness, should both go away saying it was "good to be here." To effectuate this as a preacher, you must, moreover, be a gentleman, yet, somehow, avoid letting it quite out that you are so. Beware both of Scylla and Charybdis. Eschew equally the college class-room and the conventicle, while you, nevertheless, blend an imperceptibly perceptible somewhat of both in your harmonious style of thought and delivery. Be natural and be spiritual. No bookworm, yet full of learning and literature. No worldling, yet thoroughly acquainted with the world. Touching pitch, but not defiled. Living in heaven, but not abstracted from earth—and so forth.

How many bushels of the not scarce and somewhat rubbishy wisdom, of which the foregoing slight sketch is a fair specimen, and not a caricature, would produce a preacher after the heart of the cynical critics of the Times, newspaper or the Saturday Review, is a question that may be left to the followers of the angelical schoolmen, if any there be, to investigate. But besides those not very sanctimonious oracles, the Quarterly Review, the Bishop of Oxford, and many other grave authorities, do keep now ringing the changes upon the deficiency of pulpit power, and the general declension of clerical stature in our day. The pamphlet of a "Dear Hearer," before named, reproduces these authorities, and comments upon the topic in a way likely to attract some attention. The first inquiry which suggests itself is, what is the fact? Are the allegations actually well founded and trustworthy? Supposing, in a rough way, that there are some twenty thousand preachers in ordinary to be supplied, what is the probable average of fitness to be reasonably looked for? What is the minimum of proficiency to be tolerated? Then again, if the actual average be too low—if even the intolerable but necessarily to be tolerated minimum be steadily sinking to a lower and lower standard, like that of recruits in an exhausting and demoralising warfare (as some bishops seem to say), what are the causes? and what the remedies needed? How is the better supply to be had?

Men will answer these questions according to the standpoint from which they view the subject. We know of not any panacea or patent process to the purpose. Many causes are probably operating, and many remedies might easily be suggested. The principal thing that strikes us is, that if the things alleged be true, the Head of the Church must have been offended. If the Lord build not the house, they labour but in vain that build it. When He giveth quietness, who then can make trouble? and when He hideth His face, who then can behold Him, whether against a nation, or against a man only? From the beginning, we know on the very best authority, that the harvest is great and the labourers few; and that prayer to the Lord of the harvest to thrust forth labourers into it is the suggested remedy. But sweeping and indiscriminate "complaints" and "lamentations" on the subject are probably as ill grounded, as the ordinary critical prescriptions for manufacturing the raw article into effective preachers are likely to prove ineffectual.

The pulpit, somebody has said, is the proper seat of good sense, and of the good sense of good men. If the preachers who mount the pulpit stairs be not good men, full of the Holy Ghost, it is of little importance what else they be, and of little use to admonish them. If they be such men, some inequalities and blemishes may well be tolerated; they will do their proper and appointed work, probably with their Master's approbation, though certainly not to their own satisfaction. The grace of God, sound good sense, converse with the Scriptures, sobriety, gravity, sincerity, quiet performance of duty, may not make a minister into a popular idol; but they will make him happy, useful, and efficient in his generation. How to prevent men of a different stamp from mistaking their vocation, and intruding themselves on the Church of God, is a problem which seems to have baffled rulers and congregations in every age. It is however certain that Paul, and Barnabas, and Chrysostom, and Luther, and Latimer, and Baxter, and Bunyan, and Whitefield, and Wesley, and all the other worthies of whom we hear so much when men set themselves to descant on this topic, were not manufactured into preachers by the rules and lines of criticism and rhetoric; nor do we think it likely that any others of the stamp ever will. Swift, Cowper, Sydney Smith, and other wits of all ages, have also found fuel for their raillery in the Pedants, and Prigs, and Snaugs, and Dryasdusts, who are likely to supply similar material in all time to come.

Meanwhile "the preaching of the Cross" is now, as ever, the power of God to some, and foolishness and an offence to others. If instead of this we have human dialectics; or if a concrete phantom called "the Church" (meaning bishops and paraphernalia) be substituted for Christ; and if sacraments supplant the Holy Ghost; if, in a word, the salt have lost its savour, there is nothing wherewith it can be salted. How much of the modern dislike for sermons springs from dislike of Evangelical truth in perverted minds, inclined to false religion; how much from the natural man's ordinary antagonism to the humiliating principles of Christ's pure Gospel; how much from the positive substitution of formality and false philosophy for that Gospel; how much from the impotency of some preachers, and the extravagance of others, it may be impossible to surmise. But it is equally certain that preaching is the grand and distinctive ordinance of our Lord for establishing and extending His kingdom upon earth, and that this ordinance is now the object of a curious, if not formidable, variety of assaults. Nevertheless—

The pulpit, in the sober use
Of its legitimate, peculiar powers,
Must stand acknowledged, while the world shall stand,
The most important and effectual guard,
Support, and ornament of Virtue's cause.
There stands the messenger of truth—there stands
The legate of the skies! His theme Divine,
His office sacred, his credentials clear.
By him the violated law speaks out
Its thunders; and by him, in strains as sweet
As angels use, the Gospel whispers peace.

He 'stablishes the strong, restores the weak,
 Reclaims the wanderer, binds the broken heart,
 And armed himself, in panoply complete,
 Of heavenly temper, furnishes with arms,
 Bright as his own, and trains by every rule
 Of holy discipline to glorious war,
 The sacramental host of God's elect!
 ARE ALL SUCH TEACHERS?—WOULD TO HEAVEN ALL WERE.

THE PROCEEDINGS IN THE ARCHES COURT.

THE luminous and remarkable judgment—interlocutory in essence, if not technically so—pronounced in the Arches Court by Dr. Lushington, in the case of two of the notorious "Essayists," is a study for theorists in matters ecclesiastical. We have watched with interest to ascertain whether either of the parties intend to appeal from this judgment; or whether the prosecution is to be continued in the Arches Court upon amended articles; or whether, as has been insinuated in several quarters, but which does not seem probable, the affair is to rest where it is.* Perhaps this uncertainty as to what was to be the next move may be one cause why so very little of pertinent or satisfactory comment had appeared upon the subject since the judgment was given. In one or two Evangelical organs it has been hailed with modified, but still with distinct approval and congratulation. Other parties appear to have been less satisfied at the outset; and a marked silence has very generally since prevailed. Should either party appeal in the present stage, it does not seem to us very probable that any material variation from Dr. Lushington's most able and impartial decision would ensue. Or if any such variation were to be speculated upon, we imagine it would at the present stage rather incline against the prosecution, and in favour of the defence. If the prosecution is to be continued on the amended articles, the issue to be tried will be a very narrow one in form, though most important in substance. And if the prosecution is to be dropped, which we cannot believe, the position would be too absurd to be tolerable; and must ultimately, we should suppose, lead to organic changes in the Church, and in her relations to the State.

On the supposition, however, that amended articles will be persevered with, and substantially adjudicated upon, as intimated, a few general remarks may not be out of place at present. In the first instance, it is noteworthy and satisfactory, that the points upon which Dr. Lushington has decided against the Essayists are all respecting fundamental Evangelical doctrines. The doctrinal basis of the Evangelical Alliance contains every one of those grand truths which these Essayists are alleged to impeach, and in doing so to have contravened the Articles of the Church of England. The Divine Inspiration of the Scriptures; the Atonement by Christ; Justification by Faith; and the Eternal Punishment of the Wicked; these are the important truths which are adjudged to be clearly maintained by the doctrinal standards of the Church, and to have been assailed by one or other of the two accused clergymen now on trial. On almost all other points the prosecution has entirely failed; partly because it is not clear that the doctrinal standards of the Church do contain or decide the questions; and partly because it is not certain that those standards have been so distinctly contravened as to criminate the defendants in a trial of this kind, in which the benefit of every doubt is to be afforded to the accused.

* It is rumoured that Dr. R. Williams has declined to complete his resignation as Professor in Lampeter College, since Dr. Lushington's judgment. This may argue either that he fears the final issue of the cause, or that terms are likely to be made for abandoning the prosecution.

To us this is a satisfactory issue so far. Whatever may ultimately be decided as to the fact of a breach of the law having been in the present instance committed, the advocates of the fullest and freest liberty will scarcely contend that a Reformed Christian Church could permit her accredited ministers to impeach fundamental truths of this character with impunity. The wonder, indeed, seems to be that the doctrinal standards and the law have had such wide meshes, that Dr. Lushington was coerced to confine his adverse judgment to these very few points. And even upon most of these it is obvious to every theologian that the acute and cautious judge was obliged to ground his judgment upon certain peculiar, and, perhaps, random phrases, used by Dr. Williams, a very slight variation of which would have eluded condemnation; while much that is equally and indubitably heretical did so escape, because not distinctly combated by the express words or constructive meaning of an Article. Whether the Judicial Committee of Council, on appeal, will go even so far as Dr. Lushington, in deciding that the 6th, 7th, and 20th Articles do establish the doctrine of Divine preternatural inspiration, only the result can show. It is probable they may. It is just possible they might not. And the point is one which puts severely to the test the allegation examined by us in a former number* (Dec., 1861), that a Mohammedan, Pagan, Jew, Socinian, or Papist, could, as a "legal judge," decide, as well as an enlightened Protestant like Dr. Lushington, on the "laws of the Church"—viz., her theological Articles. Any man who disbelieves the Divine inspiration of the Bible himself would, we think, have very little difficulty in deciding as "a legal judge" that the Articles say nothing conclusive about it. The expression "Holy Scripture" does not necessarily convey it. Many things are holy that are not Divine. The expression "God's Word written," though more strong, would not coerce a Socinian or Pagan judge very strongly, without more. And, however gratifying, as well as truthful, is Dr. Lushington's decision, that "in all matters necessary for salvation the Holy Scriptures emanated from the extraordinary and preternatural interposition of the Almighty," it is not at all so clear that

* Our contemporary, the Record, of 27th June, in an article on Dr. Lushington's judgment, we perceive, more suo, goes out of its way to speak of "the silly jest taken up by Evangelical Christendom." Our readers who value truth and accuracy will, perhaps, remember that it was the Record itself which seriously attacked that "inveterate joker," Archbishop Punch, for attacking Archbishop Lushington. It was in the Record, and not in Punch, we first saw the subject discussed, as the fruit of our contemporary's recondite studies, or we might probably never have known of the sacrilegious delinquency of the "inveterate joker." The point we really did take up, however, was not "the silly jest," but the serious inquiry started by the Record itself, how far theological articles can be satisfactorily expounded in a dry, legal way by a mere legal judge, who is debarred from theological help; and who, it is alleged, might be a Pagan, a Mohammedan, or a Jew. We share the opinion of many eminent theologians and lawyers, that the position is, to a great extent, fallacious. In the present judgment Dr. Lushington has ably distinguished between his own province and that of a theologian on the one hand, and the Legislature on the other; but he has also, we think, palpably proved that his own office is unequal to the emergency of the Church.

this is a proposition which every legal judge, who did not believe it at all, would feel himself bound, nevertheless, to establish as the constructive meaning of the Articles in question. We believe that Dr. Lushington has arrived at this constructive interpretation because he rightly believes the doctrine himself. So former "legal judges," of less soundly spiritual judgment, in the same court, found little difficulty in condemning a clergyman for not holding the doctrine of what is called Baptismal Regeneration. So others would find as little in deciding, upon the one hand, that inspiration is a point left open, by the silence of the Articles on the subject; or, on the other hand, that it is still more stringently contained in the Articles than Dr. Lushington finds it to be. Nor does it seem impossible even for Dr. Rowland Williams to explain away Dr. Lushington's own application of his constructive doctrine of the Articles to the views maintained by Dr. Williams. Dr. Lushington says:—

He must hold therefore that any clergyman who advisedly maintains, whether in direct or indirect language, that the Holy Scriptures proceed from the same mental powers as have produced other works, or vice versa, even with the qualification that these powers in the one case and the other differ in degree, impairs the Divine authority of Holy Scriptures, does in fact maintain that the Bible is not God's Word written, but is the work of man, and thereby contravenes the sixth and twentieth Articles of Religion.

In reply to this, in a very violent and not very intelligible letter, Dr. Rowland Williams asserts his belief in the supernatural grace bestowed on saints. There is therefore a subtle distinction attempted now, of something more than "degree," between the "inspired voice of this congregation" and the natural inspiration of what is called genius. Whether a "legal judge" of a different theological calibre from Dr. Lushington might not think himself compelled or free to decide that such a distinction was sufficient to satisfy the Articles, remains to be proved. In the meantime, it is evident that various schools of ecclesiastical and theological opinion are converging to the conviction that something here requires change. Subscription to the multifarious propositions now insisted on turns out to be in many important instances "a mockery, a delusion, and a snare," rather than a safeguard to the Church or a prevention of heresy. And apart from the question of subscription, it becomes still more and more apparent that stereotyped theological formulas, expounded by a mere "legal judge," are not quite the most excellent contrivance for the guidance, life, and purity of a living Church. Two or three hundred years, it is said, can make no change in truth. The Church, some centuries since, was, or supposed herself, in possession of the truth, and established it as law; and the "legal judge" can expound that law, and no more is now needed. This looks plausible. But then we find that this "law," in many most important particulars, has been very unceremoniously set aside by practical violators of it, who have gone unrebuked, and whose unrebuked violations have now established themselves into a counter law. The "legal judge" cannot, of course, appeal to the Bible, nor to the opinions of divines, in any case; but whatever may be the plain statement of the Articles, or his own legitimate construction thereof, he is now compelled to allow very contrary doctrines to pass unchallenged, if only they have been maintained aforetime, without prosecution, by sufficiently powerful or numerous dissentients. It seems now, therefore, to be the novelty rather than the heresy of opinions which is criminal in many important particulars.

And, in many others, neither novelty nor heresy can be brought under the condemnation of the "legal judge;" though it be palpable that almost any conceivable synod, or convocation, or conference, or committee, or jury of enlightened Christian men, would decide, with the approbation of every true Church on earth, and of the Church in glory itself, that men holding such doctrines and opinions are utterly disqualified for the office of the ministry of the Lord Jesus Christ.

How the needful changes are to be brought about; whether reform or retrogradation be to ensue; or what would be the scriptural, reasonable, and efficient modification of the respective provinces of the "legal judge," and of some concurrent theological tribunal, it would be presumptuous and premature to pretend to indicate. We live, however, in an age when principles are pretty sure to work to their legitimate results. No bolstering partisanship, no vile and vulgar virulence, can preserve what is unsound, or prevent searching discussion, or impede the march of truth and liberty for ever. Many symptoms betoken that almost all parties are seeking to shift some of the ecclesiastical and theological positions in which respectively they find themselves pent up. Much beating about there is, to very little present purpose, in Oxford Congresses, in convocational palavers, in abortive legislative attempts, and in divers other symptomatic movements. But life is at work. Not always will Augustine and Cyprian, or Paul and Laud, or salvation by grace through faith alone, and salvation by sacraments and priest-hoods, be struggling together in the Church's womb, or (worse) be linked in Mezentian shackles the living to the dead.

RECENT COMMENTARIES ON THE BOOK OF JOB.*

VERY numerous, as might naturally be expected, have been the attempts of scholars to explain the difficulties connected with the Book of the patriarch Job. These varied attempts we do not profess here systematically to review, but shall confine ourselves to a small portion of the field, and examine briefly some of the recent works written in English, or, as in the case of Professor Hengstenberg's lecture, translated into our own language, and on that account generally available to the English reader.

The very name of Job seems designed to mark him out as one signalised by great afflictions; for the name signifies "a persecuted one." We are, however, not disposed to coincide with those who look upon him as a mere allegorical character, and who deny his historical existence. The correct view appears rather to be that advocated by Mr. Davidson and other scholars, that the circumstances related as occurring to Job are strictly historical, but that some inspired poet of a later era has worked up the arguments which were probably used in the discussion between Job and his friends, in connexion with such other arguments as were in common vogue on that subject, into the well-arranged and closely-connected poem which we now possess.

It may be well to state this in the beginning, as a very common popular notion, advocated now, however, by no critic, is that the book in all its parts, as we now possess it, both prose and poetry, is historical, and that exactly such and such were the words spoken by Job, and such and such the words spoken by his friends in reply.

We perfectly coincide with the remarks which Mr. Davidson makes with respect to the advocates of the first-mentioned opinion—namely, that the book of Job has no historical basis. “For the cause of liberality, and the Christian men, such as Hengstenberg, who advocate this opinion, we must maintain, first, that such a view in itself is not derogatory to Scripture; and, second, that such a view is not absolutely incompatible with anything either in the book itself or in the words of other Scripture regarding it,” although at the same time we agree with him in considering that it “goes in the face of all probability, for such extended creations of imagination were quite beyond the Semitic genius and the universal genius of the age; and though not beyond the power of the Spirit, yet it is not in this sphere—transforming men from one mental type to another—that the Spirit works.”

But whether the book be historical or allegorical is of comparatively little importance. The great question for us is, what is it that it was designed to teach? what is the question so largely discussed by the various disputants? and what the solution of the problem which they investigated?

Of Professor Hengstenberg's view a convenient summary will be found in the lecture which has been translated; he has also elsewhere given sundry other details, which, however, we shall not refer to on the present occasion.

The theme of the book, according to his opinion, is “the sufferings of the righteous, how they are to be explained and shown to be consistent with the Divine righteousness; what should be the conduct of men so situated, and by what means the heart is then to be guided and consoled.”

But the way in which the Professor would point out the consistency is eminently unsatisfactory. While gazing on suffering righteousness and triumphant ungodliness, we are not to look solely to the compensation to be expected in the life to come. The vision of future glory may be indeed highly consolatory, but that means of consolation does not suffice. “The present life has an independent position and meaning; our first duty is to perceive and understand in it the traces of Divine Providence.” To urge the present incomprehensibility of the course of Divine Providence is in his eyes a dangerous course, “which conducts to Atheism,” and has sometimes given “Rationalism a great show of piety.” “Only when we see in the course of history a continuous judgment of the world, can our faith in the final judgment be well-founded and rational. Letters promising happiness in eternity are worthless, if their issuer gives no proof of His power and His good will in the present life. If God is the holy and the righteous One, He must be willing to manifest this His nature in His conduct towards His people and towards His enemies, even in the present world. If He is the Almighty, nothing can prevent Him from this display even in this life. Can we discern no signs whatever of such a course, then our faith in retribution after death will be in a very poor case. If sin is not here already the ruin of men, then there exists no hell; if salvation and safety do not accompany righteousness already here, then there exists no heaven. The future life is not the scene of the beginning, but only of the final accomplishment, of things. Woe to the man who hopes for an absolute future, in every respect, and in this also! He deceives himself. Who can say whether the God who now shuts Himself up inactively in heaven will then attain to a Better will and to greater power? Unrighteousness even in time is at variance with the nature of a holy and righteous God. A God who has anything to make good again, is no God at all. The Holy Scripture knows nothing of a God who only rises to power when this life has ended. Its God is from beginning to end a living God. God's righteous retribution on earth is the theme of praise throughout the entire Old Testament; and that of so lively and convincing a sort, that the Church in all ages has been driven to find therein the enlivenment of its own faith. Our Lord Himself, when describing the reward of those who have renounced everything for His sake, begins with this present life."

We have given this extract somewhat fully, lest we should be considered to have misstated Hengstenberg's opinion. Such a doctrine of Providence, in our opinion, too evidently "conducts to Atheism." "The theologian," says Professor Conant, "who thus demands that the government of the Supreme Ruler shall be tried by the maxims of human wisdom, and decries all submission not founded on a satisfactory explanation of His ways, should not scoff at Rationalism." Some things we can, indeed, explain with tolerable satisfaction in the method of God's government; but how can we understand them all? We must, therefore, be prepared to trust God as well in the dark as in the light. We cannot understand the ways of the Infinite Being, but once we know Him as our Father, and can rest in His love, then we can afford to trust Him even when "He moves in a mysterious way."

Hengstenberg professes to find his theory confirmed by the Book of Job; but he does so only by an evasion of half the question at issue. The theme of the book being the sufferings of the righteous, and these being accounted for on the supposition of being demanded by Divine justice, what are we to say with regard to the prosperity of the wicked? Surely, if Divine justice must needs punish the one in this world, much more is such punishment demanded by the other. It will not do to pass by unnoticed the more difficult half of the problem, especially since the prosperity of the wicked is the very argument on which Job relies in his reply to his friends, who thought punishment inseparable from sin, and to which they were unable to afford an answer.

Elihu, according to Hengstenberg, brought to light the real sin of Job, which was self-righteousness and spiritual pride, and showed that not only are afflictions punitive, they are also corrective. Job, confounded, attempted no reply, but confessed, by his silence, his sense of sin. Elihu is the speaker, who, according to this theory, solves the problem. He represents the authority of the Church, through which and Holy Scripture all necessary instruction is communicated to man. Had Job refused to listen to him, "had he haughtily shut his ear to the authority of the Church," he had not been instructed by the Almighty Himself. But why should the Almighty appear at all on the stage, if Elihu had explained all, and Job were already penitent? To accredit Elihu's message, and stamp it with His sanction. "Job's earlier religious point of view, notwithstanding his great piety, is thus characterised as a lower one, as one dependent on the traditions of the Fathers and on the Church; which, now that he, having been prepared by his sufferings and by the penitential discourse of Elihu, had been counted worthy of a Divine manifestation, gives place to a relation to God which is mainly direct and immediate. All religious doubts arise from our merely perceiving by the hearing of the ear. When we have once seen with the eye, we feel ashamed of our previous incomprehensible folly." "The thing of chief importance is God's appearance, not what He may say. Still, God cannot appear in silence. A discourse must accompany His appearance, as a kind of commentary thereon." And, therefore, as Professor Conant well remarks, according to Hengstenberg's notion, God speaks as a matter of state ceremony; it being of little consequence what He may say, provided only He does not trench upon the office of Elihu. Accordingly, He is made to utter "a prolix discourse, in which He makes not the slightest allusion to that solution, or its propounder."

Far more satisfactory is the explanation given of the appearance of God by the American scholar:—

The three friends appeal to the greatness of God, manifested in the creation, as a just ground of submission to His dealings. Job surpasses them all in his grand pictures of the incomprehensible power thus displayed. In place of these fragmentary views, the Divine Arbiter unveils the whole panorama of creation; revealing a vast harmonious plan, in which infinite power, wisdom, and benevolence shine with irresistible lustre. Who can calculate its duration or extent? who penetrate to its secret seeds of being? who comprehend the laws by which it is controlled? and who can question or doubt its Author and Upholder? Nor was this a mere external view, such as could be grasped by unaided human reason. The Infinite was Himself the teacher. "In thy light," says the Psalmist, "shall we see light." Now it is, under the influence of these Divine truths, clothed with supernatural power by the consciousness of a present God, that light at length dawns on the long-tried sufferer. He renounces the vain struggle after knowledge too high for man, and finds in God Himself the all-sufficing explanation of His ways.

I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear,
But now mine eye seeth thee;
Therefore I abhor it, and repent
In dust and ashes!

Such submission rests on higher knowledge and profounder insight than can be gained by special items of intelligence respecting the Divine administration. Faith has a wider range, a nobler flight. Though evil may triumph on the earth, though the wicked are permitted to oppress the good, and God Himself may seem to frown on His faithful servants, the soul that knows God believes that it is neither from oversight, weakness, or injustice in the Supreme Ruler, but that He is guiding all things on the eternal principles of justice, truth, and love, to a glorious issue. Here alone is peace for the human spirit. The apparent discrepancy between those eternal principles and the ways of Providence, is a problem which man can never fully solve, till he shall be able to comprehend at one glance the complex relations and whole extent of an infinite plan; in a word, till he shall himself be infinite.

The righteous and God-fearing Job is, by the manipulation of the German Professor, represented in an appalling character. Self-righteousness had, it seems, eaten into the very core of his heart, and ruined his integrity. "In the warmth of his feelings," says Hengstenberg, "Job frequently goes so far as to represent God as the fierce enemy and persecutor of all the righteous on earth, as Almighty arbitrariness and unrighteousness, and expresses accordingly utter despair of a favourable turn in his affairs, and the conviction that God will never rest till He has brought him to complete ruin. It is a holy stroke of art on the part of the Holy Ghost—from whom the Scripture has its origin—that He allows free and distinct expression to all the thoughts of the pious, even to those which are due to the saddest weakness of the flesh; and then shows how they are to be overcome. Even a Byron was unable to outdo this book; it leaves him far behind. Then, again—when in a calmer mood—Job confesses that God's righteousness may usually be seen in the government of the world, and only represents his own sufferings as an incomprehensible exception. Here and there, too, he rises to a joyful hope—most gloriously when the confession burst from him, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth' (chap. xix.), as though the sun of faith had suddenly shone with full clearness through the clouds of pain and rebellion; only, however, alas! to be soon again darkened."

Professor Hengstenberg seems to forget that, if this be the meaning of Job's language—and no doubt it may be distorted into such a signification—the insinuations of Satan are thereby proved correct, and Job is clearly manifested as having cursed God to His face. His piety, though spoken of by the Almighty with approbation, is proved to be only seeming, or, as Professor Conant expresses it, "the mere external, mercenary fidelity of one who makes profit the price of allegiance; who, professing to worship God, worships in reality nothing but his own fancied merit." Satan, therefore, in this view, proves victorious in the contest; for strange indeed is the notion of Hengstenberg, that "Satan was forced to retire ashamed, and lost the bet which he, as it were, laid with God at the commencement," because Job, "when actually assailed by Satan on his weak side, at the right moment, repented in dust and ashes."

We were prepared to expect much from Mr. Davidson's commentary, inasmuch as in his previous work on "Hebrew Accentuation" he had proved himself a scholar of considerable taste, and well acquainted with the latest results of criticism. Nor have we been disappointed. With no phantom of Church authority ever flitting before his eyes, and warping his mental vision, as in the case of Hengstenberg, he has produced a very respectable work, which in these days—when weak criticism and shallow scholarship is too often, alas! displayed by the champions of orthodoxy—is refreshing to read, and which, though no doubt more likely to prove acceptable to the learned, can even be read with interest, as to its main outlines, by the Biblical student acquainted only with the English language.

Mr. Davidson must not be confounded with the other well-known Biblical critic of the same name, Dr. Samuel Davidson, who has just published the first volume of an "Introduction to the Old Testament," a work which will probably soon attract general attention, and which we may hereafter bri under the notice of our readers. These two scholars differ widely in their views of the inspiration of Scripture—the Rev. A. B. Davidson being evidently a believer in the plenary inspiration of the Word of God, though fully recognising at the same time the human element contained therein.

“The problem of the Book of Job,” says Mr. Davidson, “is, Does Job serve God for nought? This problem, as between Satan and God, is naturally the question of human virtue; but as this cannot be tried abstractly, but in a case, this case exhibits the temptation of Job, the trial of the righteous; which temptation, victoriously resisted, and the means of securing victory progressively and finally exposed, illustrates the doctrine, the just shall live by his faith. The book chiefly exhibits Job’s temptations, and the progressive effect they exert on his heart; this progressive effect is the progressive solution of the problem between Satan and God, Does Job serve God for nought?—and the progressive exhibition to us of the principle of all religious life, especially in trouble, the just shall live by faith in God. In exhibiting the progress of the book we have to exhibit mainly the progressive attitude of Job, which is the real point of issue, having a double—a heavenly and earthly—relation.”

The sacred historian, in pursuance of this idea, sets before us a man of the very highest piety, and raised by God to a summit of earthly happiness. But while we gaze on the sight, and behold the blessing with which God has rewarded His servant, another scene is presented to us. The righteousness of Job is made the theme of laudation in heaven by the Almighty, and Satan instantly insinuates, Does Job serve God for nought? The challenge thus made is accepted, and Satan receives permission to put Job’s faith to the test. The powers of heaven and earth are, as it were, let loose against him, and rapine, whirlwind, and the death of his children, bring the great man to absolute ruin. He knows nothing of the reason of all these trials, but imagines they have come upon him in anger. Still the darkness of the dispensation shakes not his faith in God, and the result of the first temptation is the pious exclamation of Job: “The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken, blessed be the name of the Lord.”

Satan, foiled in his first assault, obtains permission to make a second. “Job, not only stripped of all dear to him, but thrown down under a most loathsome disorder, still retains his integrity. The deepening affliction deepens his darkness; but in his deeper darkness his convulsive grasp of heaven is the firmer. Formerly he recognised God’s right to deal as He chose with his, now His right so to deal with him. Satan is foiled anew. Job, like a tree shaken by the wind, but wraps his roots closer around the Rock of Ages. Thus closes the second scene in the temptation, the second and higher exhibition of the great principle of religious life; and thus stands the problem between God and Satan—the former calmly triumphant, having done nought, the latter ignominiously baffled, having done his worst.” (ii. 1—10.)

The final temptation lies in the apparent incompatibility of Job’s righteousness with God’s justice, in afflicting him so severely. Three friends come to console him. They believed firmly in the righteousness of God. Sin, in their view, always is punished; virtue is always rewarded. Job was formerly rewarded; now he suffers, and suffers in an unexampled manner; therefore some great sin must be the root producing this tree of bitterness.

The reply of Job must not be "rigidly measured by the square of dogmatic truth." The sentiments he utters must not be viewed as if they were the deliberate convictions of his heart. His apparently blasphemous expressions are rightly considered by Davidson as "either immediate antagonistic positions to those of the friends, and so the direct expressions of passion, self-forgetful for the moment; or (2) they are words spoken in monologue, or to God immediately after conflict with the friends; for the poor sufferer, after throwing down his human antagonists, had to stumble forward covered with the dust and blood, and heated with the fury of this combat, to meet his more terrible Divine adversary; and (3) it is the intention of the sacred writer to make Job utter what other men only dare to think, but there is not a word of Job's complaints which even yet good men under strong affliction will not equal and even surpass."

Job remained the victor in the contest with his friends; he showed clearly enough that, so far from God always punishing vice, the wicked were often the most prosperous, and he denied in the strongest terms that he was guilty of any offence. He could not deny his own consciousness, and he knew of no way in which to account for the contradictions between God's past and present dealing with him. Once amid the darkness a momentary gleam of light shone out upon his path. He had expressed, in chapter x. 7, "his conviction that God knew his innocence; already (xiii. 18) he felt that could he come before God it would be patent without proof; now he rises to the certainty (xvi. 16) that God in heaven is watching and witnessing to his guiltlessness; immediately, so sure is he of this secret sympathy of God, that he ventures to appeal to Him to become his surety (xvii. 3). Job in his ultimate agony, unwittingly or not, sounds here great deeps of Evangelical religion. Open wrath and secret love, the schism in God between the two; the necessity that God should be surety for man with God:—

My eye droppeth to God,
That he would rectify a man with God,
As a man with his fellow (xvi. 21).

What man needs is, God to take man's part against God. Thus, like fountains in the desert, bubble forth, all over this dreary pilgrimage of Job's, those clear springs of Christology. And this hope, like a conquering leader, presses on from victory to victory, and chasing before it the sable host of doubts and fears, gains its final triumph, and is crowned upon the field into assurance, no more subordinate, but regnant and supreme—I know that my Redeemer liveth" (xix. 25).

Elihu took up a position quite distinct from those maintained by the other friends of Job. Coming forward in the midst of the rival disputants, when the discussion seemed to have closed, he pointed out the mistakes on both sides. Job had been wrong in accounting himself more just than God; the friends had erred, too, in that, although they could not convict Job of sin, they yet condemned him on account of his afflictions. Elihu seems to possess a deeper knowledge of sin—"there is enough in man's nature to deserve and account for all he suffers; there is enough visible of God—visible in His general providence—to demonstrate that suffering flows from His infinite goodness." Job can answer nothing to this; he cannot deny it:

truth. Yet even this does not solve the problem. The friends of Job insisted on the penal nature of his sufferings. Elihu regarded them as sent not as a penalty, but as chastisement, while the author of the book shows us, in the end, that they were "probative."

Mr. Davidson's views respecting the reason of the Almighty's appearance are best set forth in his own words:—

Elihu came with no solution of the general problem of evil, for to explain its working would be to explain its origin; he came with no explanation of the particular evil of Job's case; that was left to the author to supply. But he came, saying much that was good and true on evil, as explainable—partly, at least, by man's sin on the one side, and God's goodness on the other: saying enough to enable a man to see his way in life in the world. Jehovah, too, came with no solution of evil—with no solution of Job's evil—but offering Himself as that which supersedes solution. He has not a word upon the question; he has only one or two upbraiding words for Job's unbecoming and faithless words concerning Him; and then He makes all His glory pass before him. All His glory—which means all His goodness—floats before Job's eyes; the patriarch realises Him, and what He is: realises himself, and what he is; meets with God, and is blessed in the meeting. There is no more complaint nor murmuring; no more talk of terrors; the problem of trouble is cast aside, as a worthless quibble, a riddle at which children may fight in vain—to him it is not solved, but its solution is superseded. Like a child who has been chastised, and who comprehends not the cause of his stripes, he has fled not from, but to the arms of the chastising Father. The difficulty remains, and must; but what of that? there is a blessedness which swallows up that and all other difficulties.

Thus Job is victorious in defeat. Conqueror of the friends, he was not yet conqueror of himself; humbled and subdued by God, he rises above himself and doubt, and all his spiritual foes. The great world-problem is solved. The human hearts which God has linked to Himself by His offered salvation, are true to Him through good and evil report: for His own name's sake, and through all darkness, they cling on to Him.

Such, in brief, is Mr. Davidson's idea respecting the nature of the Book of Job. It merits a careful examination. He views the mistakes of the commentators in general to have arisen from their having sought to discover the problem in the discussion between Job and his friends. But since the Almighty is introduced as the final interlocutor, it is certainly natural to expect that He should give the final decision on the question; and we cannot but think the point of that decision is, that as man cannot understand God's dealings in nature, he cannot expect to understand the more difficult subject of His moral government of the world. Man must have faith in God, and the things we know not now we shall know hereafter.

We have not alluded to the critical difficulties in relation to this book, as we have preferred on this occasion to speak of its general lessons. When Mr. Davidson's second volume shall appear, we propose to review his explanation of some passages in detail, in connexion with the able work of Professor Conant. The translation which Mr. Davidson has given in his commentary is of considerable merit, though in some passages we may be inclined to differ from it. It is pleasing to see a few grammatical and critical commentaries on the Old Testament gradually appearing in England, and students of the Book of Job will derive much instruction both from the commentaries of the American scholar and of the Scotch divine.

In conclusion, we must notice another work of a different character—namely, the bulky and pretentious volume of Mr. Carey, an M.A. of Oxford. Oxford, renowned formerly for her Biblical scholars, has little at the present time to boast of in the department of Old Testament criticism and exegesis. The work of her Regius Professor on the Minor Prophets is of no very great value, and still less does Mr. Carey's production add to her reputation, though it cannot, perhaps, fairly be said to detract therefrom. As a few specimens of the language of this translation, which cannot be pardoned, even on the ground of its professing to be literal—which it is very far from being—let our readers take the following, ch. i. 7: "And Satan answered the Eternal, and said, From posting to and fro in the earth." Ver. 22, "In all this Job sinned not, nor did he give God foolishness." Ch. v. 14, "They knock against darkness in the day-time, And they grope at noon-day as in the night." Ver. 26, "Thou shalt come to the grave in a full age, Like the mounting up of a shock of wheat in its season." Ch. vi. 6, "Is there taste in the slobber of an egg?" Ver. 13, 14, "Surely rather, there is no help for me in myself; And substance hath been expelled out of me. For him that melteth away there is mercy from his friend; But he forsaking the fear of the Almighty." Ver. 26, "Do ye think to reprove verse, when the speeches of one in despair [go] for wind?" Ver. 28, "But now, be pleased to face me; And to your faces will it be, if I lie." Ver. 30, "Is there injustice in my tongue? Can my palate be insensible to misfortunes?" Ch. xi. 12, "For hollow man is full of heart, and man is born a wild ass's colt" ("so full of pluck" is suggested as another rendering in the notes). Ver. 15, "For then shalt thou lift up thy face without spot, And thou shalt be solid, and shall not fear." Ver. 19, "Yea, thou shalt couch, and none shall scare thee up; And many shall stroke thy face."

It would be tedious to multiply examples of suchlike improvements on our Authorised Version, and we therefore forbear. Mr. Carey's notes are numerous enough, but deficient in critical power and taste. We would caution our readers not to rely on them; or on the translation which precedes them as exhibiting the sense of the Hebrew better than our common version, though sometimes Mr. Carey's work might be used with advantage. The Preliminary Dissertations in it are of little value, and are pervaded by too illiberal a spirit. The attempt to make use of the collections of Kennicott and De Rossi is, however, praiseworthy, and the work would doubtless have been considerably improved had its author consulted the works of the more modern critics before sending forth his volume to the world.

DISCUSSIONS ON THE GOSPELS.*

MR. ROBERTS has lately published, under the above title, a work which is likely to create considerable discussion among New Testament critics. Two years ago he put forth a similar treatise—namely, his "Inquiry into the Original Language of St. Matthew's Gospel," which was reviewed in the pages of this journal in May, 1860. The volume now before us is of much larger dimensions and greater power, and embraces the former work in a revised form. In these "Discussions" the author has noticed what he has considered worthy of note, or requiring to be refuted, in the several reviews of his former work which appeared in the pages of the periodical press, and we perceive our own notice comes in very naturally for its share.

The common, and we might almost say the universal, opinion of scholars has been, that our Lord and His Apostles spoke a kind of corrupt Hebrew, and that their discourses were, for the most part, delivered in that language. Mr. Roberts, on the other hand, endeavours to make out, on the contrary, that the Greek was in the main the language they employed. The importance of the inquiry, he considers, consists in this, that, according to the commonly-received view, the words of our Lord are transmitted to us through the medium of a translation alone; but if his opinion be correct, we have in the Greek gospels, in many cases, the exact words which proceeded out of the mouth of the Saviour, in the same language in which they were originally spoken. We do not regard this discovery, even if true, to have the importance which Mr. Roberts attaches to it, but no one can deny that the question is one of very considerable interest.

No doubt the Greek language had obtained a world-wide diffusion before the time of our Lord, and that it had become a familiar language even in Judæa. A Jewish literature had sprung up in Greek, as is shown, for example, by the instance of Philo, and by the works commonly designated as the Apocrypha. But we must, however, bear in mind that no inconsiderable portion even of these latter books are said to have been composed in Hebrew or Chaldee; although it cannot be positively affirmed that more than two of them—namely, Judith and Ecclesiasticus—were actually written in that language.

At the delivery of our Lord's Sermon on the Mount there were present "great multitudes of people from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem, and from Judæa, and from beyond Jordan." Mr. Roberts calls our particular attention to the mention of Decapolis. The ten cities from which that region had its name were Greek, and numbers of those dwelling there were not of Jewish, but of Gentile origin. The leading cities in that district were, as Mr. Roberts mentions, Gadara, Gerasa, Philadelphia, Hippos, Pella, and Scythopolis. "And the important point to be noticed is that, as Josephus informs us, these were thoroughly Greek cities. He expressly gives that name to Gadara and Hippos; and he refers to the others in such terms as leave no doubt that the Greek element also prevailed largely among their inhabitants. Nothing, indeed, is more certain, or more generally agreed upon by critics, than that this region of Decapolis was occupied almost exclusively by heathen settlers, or Hellenising Jews; and it follows, therefore, that as the Sermon on the Mount was intended to be understood, and actually was understood, by inhabitants of that district, it must have been delivered in the GREEK language."

Mr. Roberts considers this conclusion strengthened by St. Luke's account in his ch. vi. 17, where the audience of our Lord is said to have consisted of "a great multitude of people out of all Judæa and Jerusalem, and from the sea-coast of Tyre and Sidon, who came to hear him, and to be healed of their diseases;" because Greek was the language which was at that time employed in the region of Tyre and Sidon.

But admitting this fact, which can, indeed, scarcely be gainsayed, are we necessitated thereby to admit his conclusion, that Greek must have been the language in which the people collected together from all these various parts were addressed by our Lord? We would throw the onus probandi here on Mr. Roberts, and ask, how can he prove that these people from Galilee and from beyond Jordan, as well as from the other localities, were not a Hebrew-speaking people assembled to hear our Lord's teaching in their vernacular? How can it possibly be proved that there were no Hebrew-speaking people residing among the Greek-speaking Jews in Tyre and Sidon? If Hebrew (and by that term we mean not the classic Hebrew, but the vernacular Aramaic) were spoken at all in our Lord's time—which Mr. Roberts does not question, since he rather regards the Jews of that day as bilingual, speaking both Greek and Hebrew—where was it spoken, if not in Galilee, or by at least the common people at Jerusalem? (Acts i. 19, and xxi. 40.) And is there any choice per se between the two rival inductions: Among the auditors of our Lord were people from Tyre and Sidon, where Greek was spoken; therefore, to be intelligible, our Lord must have addressed them in Greek; or, Among the auditors of our Lord were Hebrew-speaking people from various parts of Palestine; therefore he must have addressed them in Hebrew? We think both of these equally imply a petitio principii; and we are glad to say Mr. Roberts does not rest his whole argument upon such a feeble basis, although his language in this case is rather too decided.

We may be permitted here to glance for a moment at one point on which Mr. Roberts considers that we have mistaken his line of argument, but on which we incline to think he has mistaken ours. Mr. Roberts asks, in the course of his discussion, where we find any ground for supposing that the Gospels merely contain translations of the words which our Lord employed? The constant formula of the Evangelists is, "Jesus said, or 'He spoke these words,' and that whether it happens to be Greek or Hebrew which they record as the language which they uttered." For instance, he asks why we should imagine "that St. John translated the word which Jesus employed, when he tells us that our Lord exclaimed on the cross, Τετέλεσται," any more than "when we are informed by another Evangelist that he cried, 'Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani?'" Now, without entering into any defence of our former remarks on this point, as being here unnecessary, we would put a case which strikes us as exactly parallel. Were we to read in English a life, say, for instance, of Schleiermacher, and now and then to come across a few words and sentences in German said to have been spoken by him, sometimes translated by the writer, and sometimes, in the case of single words, left untranslated, would we not, independently of all other considerations, except such as might appear on the surface of the narrative itself, naturally conclude that the subject of the life spoke German? And would it ever occur to our minds that because his ordinary conversation was related in English, that English was his usual language? We do respectfully submit that "the natural impression made upon our mind by the narrative" would not be "that in the one case as much as in the other the very language had been reported to us which actually proceeded out of the mouth of the individual whose words might be thus recorded."

Can it, therefore, fairly be said that to apply the same principles to the evangelic narrations implies "a manifest petitio principii?" and is there not a similarity between the two cases? The Evangelists wrote in Greek, and therefore they record our Lord's discourses and words in Greek, and very naturally say nothing of "translation" at all. But they give us single words which proceeded from our Lord's mouth in Hebrew or Aramaic, sometimes translating them, and sometimes not, and on several occasions they quote sentences spoken by Him in that same language. Is it so unnatural to conclude from this that Aramaic was the vernacular of our blessed Lord? and how can "the occasional use of Aramaic expressions in the Gospels, instead of proving that Christ habitually made use of that dialect, tend to prove the contrary?"

As to the difficulty of accounting, on this supposition, for "the retaining of such words as Πανά (Matt. v. 22) and Μαμμανά" (Luke xvi. 11), it does not appear to us great. The former had come to be a legal term. The latter may well be classified with "such words as Amen, Corban, Rabbi, &c.," on Mr Roberts's own supposition, that "the Aramaic had, as a matter of course, no small influence upon the Greek of the country; and necessarily insinuated many of its idioms and expressions into the co-existing language."

Mr. Roberts's idea with respect to the distinction between the Hellenists and the Hebrews is original, but we question its correctness. He views that distinction as not consisting in "a diversity of dialect," but in "a difference of principle." "The Hellenists were those Jews, whether belonging to Palestine or not, who willingly yielded to the influence of Gentile civilisation and habits, and were thus distinguished by their free and liberal spirit; the Hebrews, again, were the rigid adherents to Judaism, who, in spite of the providential agencies which had been long at work, endeavoured to keep up those peculiar and exclusive usages by which the Jews had for so many centuries been preserved distinct from all other nations."

Led by this theory, Mr. Roberts considers that the reason why the Hellenist widows were neglected in "the daily ministration" (Acts vi. 1) was that the Hebrews, to which party Mr. Roberts considers the apostolic college to have first belonged, were "probably under the influence, in an exaggerated form, of the same feeling to which St. Peter gave utterance in the house of Cornelius." Hence the natural outcry of the Hellenists, and hence the deacons appointed for this business were all chosen out of that party, as Mr. Roberts concludes "from the fact that the names of all the so-called deacons are Greek."

We cannot really forbear to look on this as a little bit of unauthorised speculation. The text, we think, hints very plainly at a far different reason, for it states that the murmuring arose "when the number of the disciples was multiplied;" and so far from Mr. Roberts's idea, "that the officials of the Hebrew party doubtless still continued to exercise their functions," being correct, the text expressly states that those "officials," which the whole passage leads us to infer were none other than the Apostles themselves (compare Acts iv. 35, &c.), entirely resigned the business. "But we will give ourselves continually unto prayer, and to the ministry of the Word." The common explanation of the passage appears to be much simpler—namely, that the difference between these two parties mainly consisted in the one speaking Greek, and the other speaking Hebrew, and accordingly the Hellenistic widows were naturally less known, and consequently easily passed over, in the daily distribution of alms.

We have not wished to misrepresent Mr. Roberts in any part, and we trust we have not done so, though our notice of his work must needs be very imperfect. In the brief limits assigned to us we cannot do more, and we trust many of our readers, interested in these questions, will read the book itself in extenso. Learned and candid, though advocating a somewhat novel opinion, it cannot fail to attract attention; and though we do not feel perfectly convinced by its perusal, there is enough in it to afford matter for careful study.

Foreign Intelligence.

FRANCE.

—, France, July, 1862.

IN WHAT MANNER THE BISHOPS HAVE RETURNED TO THIS COUNTRY.

Everybody has long been aware that the Romish clergy are very skilful in arranging theatrical displays. They endeavour, upon every occasion, to strike the senses and the imagination of the people by the pomp of ceremonies. It was easy, therefore, to foresee that the bishops, on returning from the city of the Vatican, would recommend their vicars-general, canons, and other servants, to prepare for them a triumphal entry.

Things, in fact, have proceeded thus, at least in certain localities, where the devotion to Popery is very extreme. The prelates announced beforehand the day and hour of their arrival. All the priests of an inferior grade and the pupils of the theological seminaries were at their post—that is to say, at the railway station—to welcome the return of their spiritual rulers. They had taken care to call together the entire multitude of the devotees—persons of the female sex especially, who are everywhere most obedient to the instructions of the clergy. Then, when the bishops alighted from the carriages, thousands of enthusiastic voices cried, “Religion for ever!” “The Pope-King for ever!” “Our Bishop for ever!” and so forth.

The Roman Catholics of Nismes have been again conspicuous by the noisy exuberance of their demonstrations. They had prepared for M. Plantier crowns of leaves and flowers. Moreover, an artificial dove had been so constructed, that at the moment when the right reverend prelate stepped upon the threshold of the cathedral this dove descended upon his head, and allowed to fall from its bill I know not what symbol of the Popish faith. You may imagine what were the plaudits and shouting of the fanatical crowd after this. It was not enthusiasm merely: it was frenzy and delirium.

The Ultramontane journals have naturally described these popular scenes in the most glowing language. They have seen expressed in them the true sentiments of the entire French nation. This is a pitiful and ridiculous delusion. Doubtless the return of the bishops produced, here and there, a certain amount of agitation among the lower classes. But there can be no mistake on the part of intelligent men as to the extent and importance of these clerical demonstrations. At Paris, at Lyons, at Bordeaux, in our principal cities, the prelates did not succeed in getting up the least excitement; they returned to their episcopal palaces with as little attention upon the part of the population as so many private tourists, after visiting their favourite watering-places. And if in some second-rate towns the return of the bishops was accompanied with public rejoicing, it was nothing more than a sudden blaze, which is already ended.

The French nation, as far as its intelligent and influential classes are concerned, has stood aloof from this vulgar excitement, and the Jesuits themselves would speedily be convinced of the fact, if an appeal were made to public opinion, and that opinion were to be pronounced upon the affairs of Italy. The discontent of the country has been increased by the unfortunate issue of our expedition to Mexico; for everybody knows that the high dignitaries of the Popish Church promoted this absurd enterprise, in the hope of restoring clerical domination among the Mexicans. France is, at length, tired of sacrificing so many men and so much money to the pretensions of the priests. This extravagance, which has been indulged into such bad purpose, ought to come to an end, and the repulse sustained by our soldiers in Mexico will perhaps contribute to hasten the evacuation of Rome.

REVELATIONS AS TO THE DISCUSSIONS OF THE EPISCOPAL BODY AT ROME.

The Patrie, a Ministerial journal, and other political papers, have published somewhat curious revelations as to what has passed in the council, or pseudo-council, convened by Pius IX. To the eyes of the profane, who beheld from afar the festival of the Japanese martyrs, and the banquet given in the Vatican library, it seemed as if the most edifying unanimity prevailed among the representatives of Romanism. But this was an appearance rather than a reality. Attentive and indiscreet witnesses (and there are such in all assemblies) have lifted the veil which concealed the deliberations of the reverend personages, and we have learned that the famous episcopal address was a work of much effort and debate.

Certain prelates, foremost among whom were the Irish bishops, were ready to hurl menaces against all the political Governments of Europe. They are accustomed, apparently, to despise appearances, and never think of reserve, in their opposition.

The Spanish bishops, who have nothing to fear on the part of the credulous and bigoted Isabella, seconded the passionate suggestions of the Irish. But the bishops of France, supported by those of Germany and the United States, having to deal with nations who would not tolerate such very violent language, moderated the indiscreet ardour of their colleagues. Certes the address, as it was adopted after the discussions, bears the impress of decided hostility to all the ideas and institutions of modern times: it would have been impossible to go farther, without calling forth the most energetic remonstrances.

M. Dupanloup, Bishop of Orleans, whose influence I mentioned in my last letter, appears to have been the inflexible antagonist of the hot-headed members of the council. He even attempted, but without success, to introduce into the address some expression of sympathy with liberal principles. The name of Napoleon III. and the protection of the French Government are not mentioned in this document. It is credibly stated by well-informed persons that the Emperor has been offended by this silence, which is evidently intentional. He may now be once more convinced that, in spite of his condescension and his good offices towards the clergy, the Pope will never forgive him for having taken part in the emancipation of Italy. There now lies a deep gulf between Napoleon III. and the Papal See. The appearance of friendly relations is still maintained, but that is all. If the priests can overthrow the Imperial throne, they will do it, and thank God for their success.

What is the final result of this council, which met amid such great display? The organs of the Jesuit party ill conceal their disappointment under high-sounding phrases. In reality, the affair is a failure. Victor Emmanuel and the Italian Parliament, far from being weakened by the attacks of the three hundred bishops, have thence derived new elements of strength and popularity. The defenders of liberty and unity in the Peninsula have never ceased to exercise full confidence in the future. Russia and Prussia have just officially recognised the kingdom of Italy. Everything proceeds, everything advances, in relation to humanity, beneath the watchful eye of God; and what matters the resistance of a few priests who, having been educated within the impenetrable walls of theological seminaries, understand nothing of the legitimate wants of civil society? In vain will the Pope and the bishops continue to declaim against religious liberty, liberty of the press, liberty of public education, the emancipation of the peoples, the re-establishment of nationalities: this blind opposition will not stop the great movement of the age.

OPPOSITION OF CARDINAL MATTHIEU TO A GOVERNMENT PROPOSAL.

Let me add, that there exist germs of division among those who are called the princes of the Romish Church and the inferior clergy. The Senate has recently furnished a curious proof of this fact.

The order of the day was to discuss a petition relative to the retiring pensions of the clergy. Baron Charles Dupin had proposed that this petition should be referred to the Government. The Minister of Public Instruction and Worship had expressed a very favourable opinion of the plan. It is, in fact, only just that priests of from seventy to seventy-five years of age should have the means of passing their last days in tranquillity, and that, when they have not the means of pecuniary support, they should receive what is necessary from the national exchequer.

Well, Cardinal Matthieu, Archbishop of Besançon, far from applauding these generous intentions of the Government, set himself to oppose them. Employing showy figures of rhetoric, he spoke of the spirit of sacrifice and self-denial of the country clergy. He said that these old priests endured, without a murmur, the privations of poverty, that they asked nothing from the State treasury, and that the Government ought to make a better use of its money, by giving it to old soldiers, &c.

This speech excited great astonishment among the senators. What! an archbishop, a cardinal, refuse retiring pensions which the civil power was disposed to grant to the aged priests! What was the secret of this strange opposition? The explanation of the conduct of Bishop Matthieu is this: The prelate, in common with his colleagues, was apprehensive of the interference of the Government in ecclesiastical affairs, and wished, at any cost, that the clergy should be absolutely dependent upon their bishops. If the State were to give money to the aged priests, it would naturally reserve a right of control, and this would be displeasing to the episcopate. Then let the country clergy remain poor, and even be without a morsel of bread in their old age, in order that they may remain completely submissive to their spiritual lords! This is the logic of the Papal hierarchy!

Can you help admiring the arguments and the language of my Lord Cardinal Matthieu? He receives, every year, from the public purse at least 70,000 francs—namely, 30,000 francs as a senator, 15,000 to 20,000 francs as a cardinal, and 20,000 to 25,000 francs as an archbishop, without reckoning other sources of income. He can therefore live in splendour and opulence, and display all the magnificence of aristocratic luxury. Then this same prelate, so liberally paid, shows disinterestedness at the expense of the aged priests, and declares that they will resign themselves, without a murmur, to the sufferings of poverty! Cardinal Matthieu would have acted more consistently had he first offered them, in his own person and establishment, the example of such rare and sublime self-sacrifice! The inferior clergy will say nothing; for they dare not utter a word of complaint against their tyrannical masters; but it is probable that they will be but little satisfied with the conduct of Cardinal Matthieu.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE PRIZES FOR VIRTUE IN THE FRENCH ACADEMY.

I have sometimes had occasion to mention the French Academy in my correspondence. This illustrious literary society fulfils, every year, a somewhat singular mission: it is entrusted with the distribution of prizes for virtue. "What do prizes for virtue mean?" your readers may perhaps ask. Can virtue be rewarded with money and honours? Is it good to confer worldly distinctions for works of charity and devotedness? This objection has been often urged against the custom adopted by the French Academy. But more than eighty years ago a generous man, the Count de Montyon, bequeathed by his will a considerable sum for this object, and the old custom is maintained.

Count de Montalembert was appointed, this year, to fill the office of "reporter" in the distribution of the prizes for virtue. This honourable personage is well known for his Ultramontane and Legitimist opinions. He is of an ardent character, has a vehement style of eloquence, and his sentiments towards Napoleon III. and his Ministers are those of the strongest antipathy. He therefore took the opportunity of the award of the prizes for virtue to attack, in bitter language, a great part of modern society, and he eulogised the Association of St. Vincent de Paul. This speech has called forth violent replies in the columns of the Ministerial papers. Is it not to be regretted that virtus should be the occasion of such bitter controversy? Is not charity in danger of losing more than it gains, when it furnishes the text for an irritating controversy? Count de Montalembert's conscientious convictions everybody must respect, and some passages in his speech command our entire approbation. But he would have been better advised had he entirely suppressed that which relates to our unfortunate political differences.

REPORT OF THE LIBERAL PROTESTANT UNION.

You are aware that there exists among the French Protestants a certain number of men—pastors and laymen—who call themselves Liberals. You are aware also that in the course of last year they founded a society at Paris, under the title of the Liberal Protestant Union. The committee has lately published its first report. This document has excited interest and curiosity. The orthodox were impatient to see if the Liberals, who had proclaimed such great things in their programmes, would be capable of executing them. I shall indicate the most important features of this report.

First, the pecuniary question. The Liberals, or Rationalists (for that is their true designation) have collected, in the space of fifteen months, 25,000 francs. This is not much. Observe, in fact, that this Union undertakes to do all that is done by our various religious institutions; it aspires to be at one and the same time a society for evangelisation—for the circulation of the Bible—for elementary education—for religious publications—for preparation for the Christian ministry, &c. This is, therefore, if I may be allowed the expression, an Omnibus Association. Now, the Liberal Union has received, I repeat, 25,000 francs to accomplish undertakings thus varied and multiplied, while the Orthodox have obtained, for the same objects, several hundred thousands of francs. What are we to infer from this? Either the Orthodox are much more numerous in our congregations than the Liberals, or they are much more generous. I believe that they are both at the same time.

The committee have expended only 11,000 francs, so that they have kept as a reserve fund 14,000 francs, or more than half the total receipts. How is this scanty outlay to be accounted for? Has not the Liberal Union been able to find opportunity for establishing a single school, opening a single new chapel, supporting a single theological student, or publishing a single religious tract? For the 11,000 francs expended by the committee, with the exception of an insignificant sum of 800 francs, given to a pastor, have been employed in the expenses of management, travelling, and similar things. It must be confessed that these so-called Liberals do not show great activity in their mission.

The committee had offered a prize for the best work on the Theological Movement of French Protestantism since the Revolution of 1789. Some manuscripts were sent in, but not a single one was thought worthy of obtaining the prize. Is not this again a proof that the Rationalists have but few eminent thinkers, few distinguished writers?

In short, the Liberal Protestant Union has been hitherto without authority or influence. It makes a noisy outcry against what it calls the narrow, absolute, and necessarily incomplete formulas of orthodoxy. It prophesies the progressive development of Christian truth by free examination. It seemed as though this Union was in a condition to regenerate France by its pretended adaptation to the wants of the age. What is the result of all its proud and boasted predictions? Nothing. Parturient montes, nascetur ridiculus mus, says the Latin poet; or to borrow a quotation from your great national poet, "Words, words, words;" such is all that the Liberals have produced to the present hour.

Do not be surprised. A tree without roots cannot bear fruit. Men who have abandoned the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel, who reject the supernatural element in the Bible and revelation, who see in Jesus Christ nothing more than the most perfect specimen of human nature, who deny the necessity of faith for salvation; such men cannot manifest true religious zeal; for that would be an effect without a cause.

MR. RADCLIFFE IN PARIS.

The name of Mr. Radcliffe has more than once found a place in my letters. His preaching and piety have been accompanied with rich blessings in Paris and elsewhere. I have met with highly-intelligent persons, belonging to the higher classes of society, who speak with gratitude, I may even say with enthusiasm, of the salutary impressions which they have received at meetings presided over by this pious servant of Christ. Mr. Radcliffe has passed some time at Geneva, where his appeals arrested the attention and moved the hearts of a great number of souls. It is true that the mode in which he explains the conditions of pardon and salvation have given occasion for criticism, and I should not recommend his addresses as a model for all preachers. But he has done good, and much good; that is an undeniable fact.

Mr. Radcliffe had returned to Paris, hoping that he would be allowed to speak in public halls. The Minister of the Interior had promised that this permission should be granted to him. But the prefect of police—I know not from what suggestions or intrigues—imposed the unexpected condition, that Mr. Radcliffe should speak only in English, and that his words must not be interpreted into French. In vain did Mr. Radcliffe's friends make the most pressing solicitations to get this whimsical restriction removed: the prefect of police was inflexible, and Mr. Radcliffe set out again for Geneva; for it was at least superfluous to preach to the French in the English language. Your readers will at once see how flagrant a violation was this of religious liberty.

OPENING OF CHURCHES AT BEZIERS AND FOUQUEURE.

More cheering intelligence will conclude this letter. A Protestant church was opened last month in the town of Beziers, department of the Hérault, amid a numerous concourse of spectators. The mayor of the city, the Imperial procureur, the local judge, and other Roman Catholic functionaries, were present. This town of Beziers was celebrated in the middle ages in connexion with the war against the Albigenses. It was there that, in 1209, a legate of Pope Innocent III. ordered the massacre of all the inhabitants, without exception, to the number of 50,000, by pronouncing these horrible words: "Kill, kill them all; God will discern who are His elect." To-day, in that same place, the Reformed faith is publicly proclaimed. Great and happy change in ideas and manners!

At Fouqueure (department of the Charente) the opening of a Protestant church had been forbidden for nine years! But the new converts of this commune did not allow themselves to be intimidated or turned aside from their duty by the intolerance of the civil power. They celebrated their worship in private houses, and even in the recesses of forests. At length the Minister of the Interior has permitted them to re-open their chapel. Perseverance is the best means of surmounting every obstacle to the progress of the truth.

EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF LYONS.

The quarterly report of the Committee of Evangelisation of the Evangelical Church of Lyons, dated June 30, gives the following among other particulars of the state of religion at several of the stations under their care :—

TARARE.—We notice with happiness and thankfulness a continuance of that good feeling of which the absence had been so long a hindrance to the progress, and even the successful maintenance of the cause of the Gospel in this station. The efforts of Swedenborgism, which had assumed a menacing appearance, have happily lost their charm, and truth, not error, is what our friends are now seeking. The recent addition of ten new members to the little Church is an encouraging event in a place where signs of spiritual life and movement have been rare long since.

VILLEFRANCHE.—We have just lost, says Mr. D——, an excellent friend from Piedmont, whither he has returned after a most happy sojourn amongst us. Having arrived in France about eight years since, he lived, like so many others, a worldly life of dissipation and folly, when—no doubt through a gracious influence from above—serious thoughts began to arise in his mind, and consciousness of sins and of sin to trouble him. Whither was he to turn himself for consolation and counsel? Towards the priests? They had no charm for him, nor had Roman Catholicism itself, and the attempts he made that way, notwithstanding his reluctance, produced no satisfaction. But the Gospel, he thought—the Gospel—must be the truth, and he therefore purchased a New Testament. This gave him some relief, and would have given more, had he not left too large a place in his heart for the flesh and the world. He thus remained in a doubtful state, and was tempted by infidelity. The Lord, however, bore with him, and led him first to Roanne, and then to Villefranche. Here he was soon introduced to our chapel, where the Lord, in His free grace, caused him to find access to the Water of Life. He now leaves us a serious, exemplary Christian. The general state of the cause at Villefranche is much the same.

TREVOUX.—Mr. V—— writes: General progress, tracts read with pleasure, and circulated freely. G—— was reading his Bible with some neighbours, when the Curé came in, saying, "What a nice dictionary you have there! let me see it!" He opened the sacred volume at St. Matthew xxiii., and having read, he said to G——, "As to this chapter, we might do without it." Whereupon the company present, fixing their eyes upon the book, asked whether M. le Curé might not, on examining further on, perhaps discover some other chapters that we might do without? and forthwith one of them purchased a Bible. Mrs. B——, formerly opposed, is at present happy to offer her apartments for little prayer-meetings.

SAIN BEL.—The evangelist writes: Twenty-seven new friends visited for the first time. Some of the friends are aiding me in the work of evangelisation. Hearers at chapel on the increase. Services maintained without interruption, as well as at ARBRESLE, where a little meeting is established of from ten to eighteen hearers. Mrs. F—— said lately that she never had felt so happy at any meeting as at the one where the police came to report. A person in an official situation is inquiring about serious things, and I have lent a Bible. Chalmers's "Evidences of Revelation" are circulating also. Miss M—— continues to attend. Seeing her at the meeting at which the police were present, I took the precaution to inform her of what was passing. She thanked me, but added, she firmly intended to remain, although she had been warned by others. "I partake of your privileges," she said, "and will also share your trials;" and at the close she came courageously forward to give in her name to the police. At Lantilly, Bully, Savigny, St. Julien, Beassenay, St. Pierre, Longessaigne, Chatillon, &c., things are continuing much the same; there is some good doing. Mr. R——, a physician, reads his Bible and other good books; he desires our visits, and offers to treat our poor sick gratuitously.

OPENING OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH AT THE CAMP OF CHALONS.

We are indebted for the following interesting account of the opening of the church at Chalons to the pastor of the Reformed Church of Bar-le-Duc, who was present on the occasion :—

A deeply-interesting ceremony took place on Thursday, July 10, at the Camp of Chalons, where 20,000 troops of the line and cavalry are now assembled. The neat, commodious Protestant church, raised by the Emperor's orders, in a fine open space in the very centre of the camp, for the use of our Protestant soldiers, was on that day solemnly dedicated to the worship of Almighty God. It is an oblong building, not very high, but spacious enough, and will contain from 600 to 700 persons. The words "Eglise Protestante" are inscribed over the door, and a plain cross stands on the top of the church in front, as an emblem of our faith and of the blessed doctrine which is to be preached there. At two o'clock in the afternoon a crowded congregation assembled within the walls. Besides about 600 soldiers, all Protestants, there were present several ladies and gentlemen, members of the neighbouring church and conseil presbytéral of Rheims, who had laboured through many difficulties with their worthy pastor to obtain the erection of the present building. General Baron d'Anselme, in the absence of Marshal Canrobert, in company with other generals and officers of all ranks, several of whom were Roman Catholics, were present at the opening service. Pastors Brun and Bisseux, of Rheims and Châlons, who will perform Divine service alternately at the camp until a special chaplain is appointed, were joined by Pastors Guiral and Trocquemé, from Sedan; de Boinville, from Bar-le-Duc; and Vallette and Dhombres, from Paris. M. Guiral, as President of the Consistory, opened the service by placing the Bible in the pulpit and reading, and by the consecration prayer; after which, M. Dhombres preached a most able and stirring sermon on Acts i. 8—"Ye shall be witnesses unto me," &c. I will not attempt to give even an outline of his discourse. You may imagine how deeply every word was felt. He stood before a congregation of Protestant soldiers, whom he addressed as the free and now highly-privileged descendants of the suffering, but faithful, gallant, loyal, and renowned Huguenots, many of whose names he mentioned in connexion with historical anecdotes most calculated to awaken attention and kindle a flame of Protestant and Christian feeling in every mind. In a most impressive manner he called God to witness that these were not words of acrimony cast upon the memory of the persecutors; but he adverted to the trials of their ancestors in order to stir them up, by every motive of gratitude to God, by whom all hearts are directed, to be in these days of freedom and justice as loyal subjects, and especially as faithful witnesses for Christ, as their forefathers had been in the best and most glorious days of French Protestantism. He said this was not a congregation of an ordinary kind. "Soldiers!" said he, "you here represent the Protestantism of France, and hearts from all parts of the country are turned towards you. Your fathers and mothers are praying for you, and the work we are doing concerns the present and future and eternal welfare of thousands." He hoped that peace might long endure, but in case of war he assured them their chaplains would still follow them and watch over their souls. Deep and universal evidently was the impression produced when alluding to the two pious chaplains whose remains lie buried with the bodies of so many who fell near Sebastopol. The preacher exclaimed: "Oh! if God should ever permit me to visit the Crimea, where so many of our gallant soldiers shed their heart's blood in the service of their country, I would go under the walls of Sebastopol and seek till I had found the graves of my dear friends Chardon and Babut, and read inscribed upon their tombs as it was upon their hearts, 'The Good Shepherd giveth his life for his sheep.'" Many such touching allusions aroused the attention and moved the stout hearts of the young soldiers.

Good Pastor Vallette, of the Lutheran Church, then addressed the soldiers. He came as representing the commission mixte—a committee composed of some of our most influential men of the Reformed and Lutheran Churches, with a view to furnishing Protestant chaplains for the army, a work the importance of which it would be difficult to overrate. In a familiar and awakening manner he reminded the officers and men of the necessity of adding spiritual to military exercises, and of the general review which will ere long take place before the King of Kings.

Thanks were duly offered to the Emperor, the Minister of War, &c. After which, Pastor Brun ended this most interesting ceremony with thanksgivings and prayer.

Some religious soldiers lingered behind to shake hands with us, and informed us that two good colporteurs frequently visit them, and have sold many Bibles and Testaments.

Let us hope and pray that many of these soldiers will know the day of their visitation, and become Christ's faithful witnesses in the army, till they return home to become faithful brothers and fathers in our Israel.

SWITZERLAND.

MISSIONARY ANNIVERSARY AT BASLE.

Basle, July 5, 1862.

A great number of Christian friends assembled here during the last few days, on account of the "festival week" of the good Basle people. The anniversaries of the Bible Society, the Jewish and Foreign Missions, Female Education in India and Africa, the Union of Swiss Ministers, and of other schemes of Christian activity, are crowded into the first week of July. Strangers from far and near are received with the greatest hospitality; in the evenings the guests meet in private gardens, where the liberality of the owners offers to every one simple refreshments. Wednesday and Thursday are entirely appropriated to the transactions of the Basle Missionary Society. This time they celebrated their forty-seventh anniversary, and it proved a very refreshing season.

We first witnessed the examination of the students in the capacious Mission-house. Three halls were filled with them, there being eighty-three students, in six classes. They are gathered from all parts of the globe; nearly half of them come from Wurtemberg, one-fourth are Swiss; the rest Germans and French, with a sprinkling of Swedes and Russians; lastly, six Armenians from Constantinople and Shamakhi, and three Hindoos from Malabar. The negroes had no representative left: one, a very hopeful youth, had lately been taken away by consumption; his brother had embarked for the Gold Coast—the first ordained native of that mission. The supply of missionary students appears to be almost unlimited. From twelve to twenty are chosen every year out of three times that number of applicants. It was a pleasure to see them seated together, and witness the satisfactory progress of their studies. A truly catholic spirit pervades the institution. All German and Swiss Churches are here represented; yea, I understand that some of the Armenians, the fruits of a remarkable awakening in the late Caucasus Mission, have not even formally left the Church of their fathers. The conversion of the heart rather than the creed professed is the point most considered in their reception.

But I hasten to give some of the interesting statements of the report. The financial position of the society appears to be somewhat embarrassed, in spite of a steadily-growing income. This amounted, for 1861-2, to 675,767f. (about 27,023*l.*); the charges reached the figure of 28,487*l.* Nearly half of this sum went to the account of the India Mission (13,400*l.*), the rest to that of Western Africa, 7,600*l.*; China, 680*l.*, North America, &c. The deficits have been slowly accumulating to a debt of 2,440*l.*, mostly in consequence of the extension of the mission fields. On the Gold Coast, for instance, where in 1857 the European staff of the Mission numbered only twenty persons, there are now thirty-nine.

The report spoke of the West African Mission as having passed through a critical season. Slavery seems to have been the chief difficulty to be overcome. It is the groundwork of social life in Africa. The treatment of slaves may be more lenient on the Gold Coast than on the Pepper, or Slave Coast; still the slave is merchandise, that can be sold, shipped, or sent after the owner when he dies, to attend on him in another world. And polygamy is everywhere the inseparable companion of slavery; for the master marries the slave to whom he will, or takes her himself; so that true matrimony becomes impossible under the system. Now the Mission had, for a time, nothing to do with the question of slavery. The young men who joined it had been educated in its schools, being neither slaves nor slaveholders. When the first slaveholders were converted, the hope was indulged that, in process of time, the anomaly would be removed by Christian instruction. It proved as futile as in the case of Indian caste. Every missionary and each station laboured to compass this end in their own way, with more or less success. Mistakes were made, and had to be rectified; sometimes with a sacrifice of consistency. Progress achieved in one direction was counterbalanced by over-lenieny in another. It became necessary to lay down rules for obtaining unity in theory and practice. The committee have, therefore, sanctioned some simple rules—That, to own a slave is a thing opposed to Christian love; that to be a slave is not a sin, but a misfortune; that to enter the state of slavery, by selling oneself, or seeking an owner, is forbidden to a Christian; that in the case of slaveholders becoming Christians, there exists a collision of the sixth and eighth commandments, which can only be solved by the owner yielding his right to the possession of the slave, whilst the slave yields his right to entire freedom, and consents to continue his service; that the transition to full liberty is effected by temporary, in some cases even a lifelong, servitude, not involuntary, but entered upon by free men—in no case involving the rights of the children. These principles were adopted, not without some struggles, and have been carried out in such manner that no person was to be retained in the service of the Mission who still holds slaves. Sad to say, there were even a few catechists who held slaves, though in mitigated servitude. These had to set them free unconditionally, on pain of dismissal. The Christians in the five churches of the coast numbered 746 in January, when there were 522 children in the schools. Additions have since been made. And the seminary for the education of teachers gives satisfactory results.

In Western India the society has fifteen stations, occupied by forty-eight Europeans, of whom forty are ordained, whilst eight laymen serve the mission in different capacities. The number of Christians amounts to 2,997 souls; 700 Christian and 1,900 heathen children are educated by the mission. The Canara Mission is to be extended, in consequence of the liberal grant of premises by an officer at the Sircy station. Two Brahman youths have lately been baptized at Mangalore, having, after a severe struggle, broken through the ties of family and caste. Other young men educated in the English schools profess an inclination to follow their example. The report on the five stations in the South Mahratta province contains likewise encouraging features. If Dharwar appears to be still a barren field, and Malasamudra has not answered as an agricultural colony, Guladgudd enjoys a thriving church of sixty members, and Hoobly, as well as Bettigherry, have been cheered by decided conversions from among the heathen. In Malabar all the six stations are progressing favourably. Itinerant preaching has been carried on with considerable success. A number of cultivators about Palghaut have lately applied for Christian instruction. Good news came also from the mountaineers on the Nilgherries. Twelve years had elapsed before the first Badaga believed and was baptized (1858). He was deprived of his wife and children, his hut separated by a hedge from the rest of the community, his intercourse abhorred by all his friends. Now Abraham is rejoined, not merely by his family, but by several young men, who have boldly confessed Christ. And after all the excitement which these struggles produced, Abraham's integrity is so much valued by the rest of the clan, that they have chosen him for their umpire in settling a difficult matter, and both parties submitted to his decision without a murmur.

The China Mission has this year been reinforced and cheered by new accessions. The missionary at Hongkong has a church of sixty-four Hakka Christians, who assemble in the chapel of the London Missionary Society. The station at Lilong numbers 115 souls; and the catechist in the Chonglock district, though long left alone with his small community of seven converts, has been enabled to achieve a great work under considerable persecution; 200 persons apply there for baptism, and the movement is spreading.

Many other interesting features in the work came out, to which I cannot refer at length. I was particularly struck with what the Rev. Mr. Nagel, of Neuchatel, related concerning the interest the Sunday-schools of that canton take in the work of missions. A number of the poorest of the poor had contributed sixty francs, being the proceeds of rags, bones, and other articles gathered in the streets! The festival closed with the dismissal of five missionaries, who are to proceed to India, Africa, and America. In the latter continent the operations of the society are likewise extending. Not only have they sent sixty-six ministers to the German colonists in the United States; in consequence of the exertions of the Swiss Consul-General in Brazil, that country has also been opened to the society, which employs already four labourers in the German colonies of the South. May the blessing of the great Head of the Church continue to rest on this work in all its branches!

ANNIVERSARY OF THE EVANGELICAL SOCIETY OF GENEVA.

We translate from La Semaine Religieuse the following report of the proceedings of the Evangelical Society of Geneva at its last anniversary, held in that city:—

The society's first meeting was held on Wednesday, June 25, at four o'clock, and was opened by an interesting address from M. Merle d'Aubigné: we say an address, for while giving an account of the labours of the Theological Seminary, he dwelt largely on general questions. Twelve students have, this year entered the Theological Seminary, and twonly the Preparatory Seminary. The direction has been compelled to restrict the number of its bursaries. The number of this year's students has been forty-three. Unfortunately, in the course of the studies there have been losses. Two students have died, a third was taken away by conscription, and a fourth has gone elsewhere to terminate his studies. Three students have quitted the seminary, after having passed their examinations.

Reference was afterwards made by the speaker to the claims of the late M. Galland to the gratitude of the meeting. This excellent man was the first director of the Missionary Institute of Paris, and one of the founders of the Evangelical Society. Afterwards he was successively pastor at Sonvilliers and Neuveville, and it was in the midst of the labours of an active and blessed ministry that, on the 9th of May last, God called him to himself.

M. Merle next adverted to, and opposed, certain animadversions, contained in two recent publications, upon the work of the Evangelical Alliance, and concluded by reminding his audience, that the glory might be ascribed to God, of the blessed influences which had accompanied the meetings of the Evangelical Alliance and of the impulse which it had given to the religious movement in the city of Geneva.

The meeting was then addressed by M. Milsom, of the Evangelical Church of Lyons; M. Turin, evangelist at Milan; and M. Pastor Bonnard, representing the Free Church of the Canton de Vaud.

The second meeting was held on Thursday morning. The finance report was read by M. Quiblier, Secretary to the society. The receipts amounted to 150,640f. 65c.; the expenses to 147,200f. 70c.; showing a balance of 3,439f. 95c., which was applied in liquidation of the outstanding debt, thus reduced to 5,561f. 95c. The contributions collected at Geneva have shown some slight diminution.

M. G. Naville read the report relating to evangelisation and colportage. The society employs in France twelve pastors and ministers of the Gospel, twenty-one schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, eight evangelists, and twenty colporteurs; and at Geneva, four evangelists. For the first time the committee gave some details respecting the work of evangelisation which has been carried on by them, since 1842, in Geneva.

The meeting afterwards listened successively to M. Euler, representing the committee of evangelisation of the Free Church of the Canton de Vaud; M. Vernet, of Geneva; M. Pastor Duproix, of Mâcon; M. Pastor Descombaz, of Geneva; the Rev. Alexander Campbell, of Montrose, Scotland; M. Pastor Charpiot, of Sornay; M. Malan, Moderator of the Vaudois "Table;" M. Casalis, Director of the Paris Missionary Institute; an American minister and a German deputy, whose names escaped us. The meetings were well sustained, and left a good impression upon those who had the privilege of being present at them.

ITALY.

Florence, July 16, 1862.

THE LAST MOVE, AND ITS IMMEDIATE RESULTS.

The game is being played quickly. It is easy to see who is to win, but both parties are skilful and in earnest. The Pope had the last move, and for the moment he has checkmated his opponent. What next will happen it is difficult to foresee. The meeting of 300 bishops and some 7,000 priests and devotees in Rome has been admirably managed. The united action of so many men, among whom considerable differences obtained, exhibits no small state craft. Even to Protestants the ceremonies at the canonization of the Japanese martyrs and the exaltation to the place of a dogma of the temporal power were most imposing, albeit the cardinals took part with their usual undevoutness. Though Rome has now played her last card, though this council resembled the practice of certain traders who indulge in banquetting their friends on the very eve of bankruptcy, still the marvellous power of the Papacy in calling together so many dignitaries from all the ends of the earth, and welding them into one solid phalanx for the support of mother Church, has greatly discouraged the Italians, who underrate the strength of the Vatican when brought face to face with the revolutionary progress of the age. The bishops have returned to their various dioceses with orders from head-quarters, like so many generals of division, to carry out among the rank and file of the priesthood the new motto of Rome, "Conquer or die," aut Caesar aut nullus. The organs of the press, to whom the Pope is everything, and independent thought nothing, are full of jubilation and defiance. Antonelli is so elated with his successful strategy, that he has refused the final and most tempting offer of French mediation with the unfailing non possumus. Even the Pope has revived his spirits at the sight of so much adoration, and, true to his youthful instincts, has caused the cross to fall before the sword, by setting about the erection of a soldiers' barrack on the site of the ancient Pretorian camp, and reviewing his army of Zouaves, carabineers, sbirri, and Chiavones, which is to be largely recruited from home, through the efforts of Cardinal Wiseman and Archbishop Cullen. The Italian bishops, who were not allowed to join their foreign brethren in Rome in hatching plots for the downfall of the kingdom, have sent epistles to the Pope, in mournful strain, deploring their hardships under the iron rule of the King of Piedmont, and regretting their absence, owing to the tyranny of foreign despotism. Sixty of these prelates in the Neapolitan provinces sent a declaration of their unswerving fidelity to the See of Rome. Only one member of the Italian Episcopal bench, Bishop Caputo, of Naples, takes the popular side. He is therefore looked upon as the black sheep, and was denounced in no very charitable terms by Pio Nono himself, as a son of perdition.

PENALTIES ON ECCLESIASTICS — THE POOR PRIESTS AND THEIR ILLIBERAL SUPERIORS.

The poor priests over the land who have dared to sympathise with young Italy will now fare badly, unless the Government steps in to prevent a crusade of persecution. The authorities have made bold to imprison for three years, and fine in 100*l.*, Monsignore Canzi, the Capitular Vicar of Bologna, for refusing Christian burial to Count Rota, a noted Liberal, and for distributing in the diocese the instructions of the Sacred Penitentiary at Rome with regard to various cases of conscience; while Mazzoni, the parish priest of San Procolo, who was aider and abettor in the affair, has got one year's imprisonment, and been fined in 40*l.* The Court of Assizes at Ravenna has also sentenced the priest of Russi to eighteen months' imprisonment, and 60*l.* fine, for refusing the last offices of the Church to the syndic of the town; while Pierdonati, the archpriest of Otricoli, is in prison, awaiting, doubtless, a similar judgment, for refusing absolution to a dying soldier. Surely the poor priests are not to be left at the mercy of their superiors. Now that the Pope has refused every offer of conciliation, and throwing away the scabbard, is resolved on war to the knife, I hope no timidity will prevent the Cabinet in Turin from succouring the minor clergy, who are to be compelled, on pain of deposition, to sign the document drawn up by the bishops in Rome. The Minister of Worship has issued a circular in this direction. The Passaglians alone, as the priests are now contemptuously called by the Antonellian organs, who have signed the liberal address to the Pope got up by the quondam expounder of the Immaculate Conception dogma, number 6,000. Every effort has been used to prevent their subscription. In Brescia two meetings of the clergy were held to impede the movement, so that many timid and dependent men dare not send in their names. The Armonia has issued a list of 116 priests who reclaim against their names being appended to the address; but it turns out that other priests of the very same names had authorised Passaglia to do so. The confusion has arisen from the necessity imposed on the editor of the Mediators, while printing the names, to withhold the addresses, for fear of persecution. You may, therefore, take for granted that the address with 6,000 signatures is a genuine one, after passing through such ordeals. Once the Government, as it is in duty bound, takes up the cause of these priests, who are forwarding its interests, we shall enter on a new phase of the Italian struggle.

THE LIBERAL PRESS AT ROME AND BOLOGNA, AND THE PROTESTANT PRESS AT FLORENCE.

The feeling of the Italians is one of utter astonishment that the Pope should be so blind to his own interests, and so regardless of the welfare of those who would willingly respect him as the Vicar of Christ. On the bench of a seminary in Rome may be found written, "Death to Victor Emmanuel at the cannon's mouth!" but how often this winter have the inhabitants of Rome shown their detestation of Papal rule. Very cleverly did they at early dawn in June paint a few hundred Italian tricolor flags with "Viva Roma, capi d'Italia" mottoes with pieces of clay, and throw them on the houses of the city, to hang there, far beyond the reach of hand or ladder. I had the pleasure of reading lately a number of Italia e Roma, an uncompromising Liberal journal, which treats only of the Roman question, printed in Rome, at the National Printing-office, though for the present editorial communications are to be forwarded to the Perugia Post-office. Despite the increased number and energy of the Papal police, this able paper, and many other Liberal documents, are printed and circulated in sight of the Vatican, without any clue being got as to their origin or the whereabouts of their authors. With even greater satisfaction I have been perusing the Providenza del Popolo, a Bologna newspaper recently started by an ex-priest, who has fought the battles of his country, from the siege of Rome onwards. It is the most evangelical of all the liberal organs, gives all the news of Bible circulation and evangelisation, talks nothing of Church reform, but of learning the Church to go to Christ, and has had the honour of being five times sequestered during the last two months for speaking the truth boldly touching the machinations of the priests. The editor naturally complains of the Government Fiscal, and wishes to know whether Bologna is in France, China, or Italy. He is not aware that in Florence, for example, the direst opposition is offered to the circulation of religious tracts and journals by the Royal Prefect. The work of the colporteur has consequently come to an end here, and many an effort of Christian usefulness has been nipped in the bud by this illiberal and bigoted conduct.

RECENT POLITICAL EVENTS.

The recognition by Russia and Prussia of the Italian kingdom, and the marriage of Princess Mary of Piedmont to the young King of Portugal, have been hailed as facts of great importance. And yet the heart of the nation is so ill at ease, that no great joy is expressed. A kingdom without a capital is a sorry affair. The fact is, that things cannot long stand on their present footing. You know how strangely the proposed movement on the Tyrol was checked a month ago. This week Garibaldi is inciting the Sicilians to deeds, not words, and they respond to his call. The republican party is strong everywhere and grows daily in strength, from the contempt universally felt for a ministry at Turin which does the bidding of Napoleon. The organs of the party are violent against the Government, and therefore cheer the hearts of our grand-ducal and royalist coteries. The common enemies of liberty are making merry, and see at hand a restoration of the old régime. The manifesto of Lucien Murat has been printed in Florence, with the view of circulation in the South, where he craves the throne of Naples. But for these storm signals, it were desirable that the Pope, who is aiding powerfully the Protestant movement by his stubbornness, should remain a few years longer where he is. A year in a crisis like this counts for fifty in ordinary times, so far as the enlightenment of an excited people is concerned. Ere long the nation will be ready for the major excommunication, and will make a clean riddance of Papal authority.

PROGRESS OF EVANGELISATION.

The circulation of the Bible is bearing precious fruit. A small village in the neighbourhood of Florence is found to contain many Evangelicals. In an extensive farm of Tuscany the labourers are all readers of the Scriptures. Nightly reading meetings in Florentine private houses have been carried on during the winter by various foreign and native brethren. New stations for preaching the Gospel have been this month opened in Arezzo, Sienna, Bagni di Lucca, and Lucca. The last-named town in the sixteenth century contained many converts to the truth, who fled from persecution, and enriched other lands with their piety and industry, among whom were the Turretini, Burlemacchi, Diodati, and Calendrin of Geneva, and the Sillemans of America. Let us hope that a godly seed has been preserved in Lucca for the pure worship of God. The other day the student Gregori was acquitted by the tribunal of Lucca for writing against the religion of the State, and the same evening he was requested to preach the doctrine of the Cross to some thirty brethren, whom he had not heard of before, and who have asked him to continue with them, labouring in word and doctrine. The new Waldensian place of worship in Modena is crowded to excess, while the Wesleyan missionary, Mr. Piggott, has just purchased an old Catholic chapel in Parma, and began Divine service, as well as opened a dépôt for Bibles and religious books. The work still goes on prosperously in the Island of Elba, at Portoferrio, Rio, and Longone. Several evangelists are at work, and have established Bible-classes, Sabbath-schools, and psalmody practice in the three congregations. I might mention many more openings, but the labourers are wanting.

CONTROVERSY WITH THE PARISIS.

The congregation in Pisa was greatly disturbed last year on the occasion of a baptism. The father of the child was hurried off by the crowd, and compelled to have the sacrament performed by a priest. Legal proceedings were instituted and the offenders severely punished. Since then no attempt at molestation has taken place, and lately another child of the same man was baptized according to the simple evangelical rite. Signor Tecchi, the minister of the church, has figured this winter to great advantage in a discussion with Padre Buselli, of Massa Maritima, as to the meaning of the epithet applied by the angel to the Virgin Mary, "highly-favoured," and not "full of grace!" The editor of the Buona Novella, a journal which is becoming increasingly interesting and useful, follows up the controversy with a very learned investigation of the whole subject. For this Dr. Chiesi is peculiarly qualified, having long studied and compared the different versions with the originals. His private collection of Bibles is one of the best in Italy, and he is now engaged on an Italian Hexapla of the New Testament, compiled from the translations of Diodati, Brucioli, Martini, Malermi, Pagnini, and Vatablo. A philological work from his pen, entitled, "Who has Falsified the Bible, the Protestants or the Catholics?" has already done good service.

Similar discussions are everywhere forced upon our evangelists, and hitherto they have been overruled for calling attention to vital questions which had never before suggested themselves. The cheap publication societies of Leghorn and Pisa issue their monthly exposition of Catholicism, and mark the progress of the Gospel in Leghorn by their increasingly-violent abuse of Mr. Ribet. Naples has followed the example with its "Catholic Readings," and Bologna, too, sends us "The Catholic Dawn" and "Short Catholic Readings." The growth of such apologetic literature evidences the wide circulation of evangelical books and tracts among the peasantry of the land.

A PERSECUTED COLPORTEUR: A LIBERAL MAGISTRATE: AN IMPRISONED BISHOP.

The delegate of Montepulciano, half-way between Florence and Rome, lately seized the books of Colporteur Mazzei, and in a very lordly proclamation banished the in-offensive man for a year from that part of the country, under threat of fine and prison. It is hoped that the books will be restored; but, unfortunately, the case was not reported till the legal time during which a protest might have been lodged had elapsed. Very different has been the conduct of the magistrate of Chiavari, a little way south of Genoa. The Cerighini at Favale have been subjected to malicious interferences in their little church, but they have ever found redress at the tribunal of Chiavari, where the law has been thus tersely and nobly expounded: "It is true the first article of the Civil Code establishes the Catholic Apostolic faith as the religion of the State, but it is equally true that the first article in the Constitution of the kingdom distinctly says that all other forms of worship presently existing are tolerated. The Code separates, isolates, and excludes, but the Constitution throws open the door to free thought, brotherhood, intercommunication, and union among citizens. We must rid ourselves of that old fanaticism which cannot deign to treat with a man unless he professes the same belief as ourselves."

The Bishop of Mondovi has this week been fined and imprisoned for publishing in a circular the instructions of the Sacred Penitentiary. This latter is an institution in Rome, established and presided over by a few of the ablest Jesuits, for the purpose of solving the doubts of any priest in peculiar cases connected with the confessional or the marriage ceremony. It has of late exceeded its powers, in the judgment of the Government, as a private and spiritual jurisdiction, by legislating against all who hold liberal opinions in regard to the temporal power, and hence the culpability of the Bishop in sending forth its mandates as binding on the consciences of Italian priests.

A first-class boarding-school has been opened in Milan, under the auspices of the active Wesleyan missionary, Mr. Piggott, for the education of the children of the upper classes. It cannot fail to be a successful and valuable means of evangelisation.

Frankfort, July 15, 1862.

THE GERMAN NATIONAL SHOOTING MATCH AT FRANKFORT.

An event is now taking place at Frankfort, all the details of which you will read in the public journals, but the political significance and the religious aspect of which will not be comprehended by a foreigner. This is the national shooting match, which this week has drawn together to our city eight or ten thousand carabineers from all parts of Germany and of Switzerland, accompanied by a proportionate multitude of foreigners, who throng all the hotels. The popular enthusiasm which everywhere animates this fête—all our streets paved with German cloth of three colours (not seen since 1849)—all the public discourses which loudly proclaim the approaching unity of the German country—above all, the sullen silence of the Governments, which let everything pass, because on all sides they behold themselves mastered by the rising tide of Liberalism—all these facts make it apparent that this is the greatest political manifestation which has agitated Germany since 1848. Men feel themselves on the eve of a vast revolution—a revolution, however, which the peoples seem resolved to accomplish by peaceful means, to the end that it may not be assailed and shattered, as in 1848, by standing armies, which were then the instruments of that reaction which has now lasted twelve years.

Every popular movement has its moral and religious aspect, although itself in no way occupied with religion. Now it is this aspect which should fix the attention of the observer who would understand the nation. Unhappily, we know that German Liberalism is far from being religious. When, in 1848, a member of the National Assembly, under the crypt of the Church of St. Paul, proposed to open the session of the Parliament with prayer, the irreligious members laughed at him, and no prayer was offered. The political fête of Frankfort, in its turn, has been the occasion of a great profanation of the Lord's-day. Sunday, the 6th July, had been chosen to inaugurate by a banquet of 3,000 or 4,000 persons the vast shooting-hall, built for that purpose. This repast had scarcely terminated, and the crowd upon the ground (which is out of the city) was increasing, when a fearful hurricane, accompanied by torrents of rain, burst over the country, breaking and uprooting the largest trees, and tearing off with violence the roofs of the houses. The shooting-hall in part fell upon the persons within it; two were killed, several severely wounded; all overwhelmed with terror, almost thinking that their last hour was come. Terror prevailed even in all the houses of the city. This warning was not regarded by the promoters of the fête. The following Sunday (July 13th) was further chosen for the inauguration, by a grand procession of all the marksmen through our streets, and by a banquet in the same hall, with great difficulty repaired. The immense excitement thus caused amongst the population naturally rendered impossible all assembling for worship; all the churches were almost empty; and in those nearest to the tumult there was no preaching. You are aware that nowhere on the Continent is the Lord's-day sanctified as in England; in Germany, especially, multitudes recognise neither the obligatory principle nor the practice of the Christian Sabbath. Consequently, so flagrant a violation of the holy day does not make the impression that it would amongst you. A majority do not regard it as the transgression of a commandment of God, which command, as such, they believe to have been abrogated. But in whatever light we regard the day of rest—were it only a great and holy privilege for Christian people—it is always true that such a contempt of this gift of God is a subject of profound regret to all pious men. What interest can I take in your schemes of political renovation, when you begin by outraging my most cherished feelings? or in your national liberty, when you deprive me of the liberty of worshipping my God on His own holy day? And if instead of invoking the blessing of Him who rules the nations on your enterprises for the good of your country, you provoke His just judgments, "you sow the wind, and shall reap the whirlwind." (Hos. viii. 7.)

So much the more must we lament that in Germany the religious men, who might exert a good influence over these legitimate aspirations of the peoples, hold themselves aloof, and condemn them as rebellious, if not impious! Even religious liberty has not yet found favour in their eyes; they leave to politicians the care of defending it; it is in the chambers of the Parliament that this cause is pleaded, and often then, it must be confessed, not from motives of religion.

DISCUSSIONS IN THE CHAMBERS OF WURTEMBERG AND OF PRUSSIA UPON RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

Thus, the second Chamber of Wurtemberg has recently discussed petitions demanding this liberty for the dissenting sects of that country. These are the Wesleyans, the Baptists, and other denominations, who show themselves very active; often, it must be confessed, very aggressive, against the National Church. They have frequently to suffer from prosecutions, fines, and even imprisonment; and they demand from the Chamber to be emancipated from these fetters. They will certainly obtain the object of their wishes. And then we hope that the National Church of Wurtemberg—which is not persecuting, which is sufficiently large and powerful to bear with contemporaneous dissent—will learn that religious liberty is not only a right of conscience, but the only means of neutralising the zeal, sometimes bitter, of its adversaries, irritated by persecution. It will learn even that these little dissenting communities will become so many spurs in its own sides, which will give it a salutary stimulus, and will thus become a preserving salt for the mass of the community.

A question much more difficult, originating from petitions, is now before the Second Prussian Chamber. It is the emancipation of the Jews from certain restrictions which legislation still imposes on their civil and political rights. More particularly it is debated whether Israelites shall be admitted into the magistracy, and to sit as judges in the courts. The Ministry have combated the petitions by different arguments which have not appeared conclusive to the Chamber; for, by a large majority, it has referred the petitions back to the Ministry, that justice may be done. What will be the result? It would be difficult to predict, for if, on one hand, there be injustice in depriving certain citizens of their rights, whilst, like others, they pay all the taxes, there exist, on the other hand, amongst the people invincible prejudices against the Israelites. Whatever may be the issue, the letter of the Constitution is, formally, on their side. Will the spirit of the nation continue, as it has hitherto been, against them? This is the question!

And this question depends on one still greater—that of which I spoke in my last letter—the separation of the temporal from the spiritual—of the State from the Church. We should say then that it is at Rome that this question is being debated, and will be decided for the whole of Europe. Now a great step has just been taken towards the settlement of this question. And that step is—

THE RECOGNITION OF ITALY BY RUSSIA AND PRUSSIA.

We have throughout Germany a great Protestant party, to whom this recognition is as disagreeable as to the Catholics. This is because, ecclesiastically speaking, their cause is the same, and that cause has received a heavy blow by this important diplomatic act. The kingdom of Italy being now admitted into the European family, there is no longer room for the temporal power of the Pope. And the results will everywhere unfold themselves in respect of the relations between the State and the Church. We ask of God but one thing—namely, to see the Gospel of Jesus Christ left to itself, freed from the shackles of earthly powers, and the corrupting influences of worldly politics, standing alone, face to face, with error, with superstition, and with sin; it will then once more show that it is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." (Rom. i. 16.)

APPROACHING MEETINGS OF THE GUSTAVUS-ADOLPHUS SOCIETY AND OF THE KIRCHENTAG.

We are about to have, at the commencement of the autumn, two great religious gatherings—the annual meeting of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society, at Nuremburg, and the Kirchentag, at Brandenburg. This is the first time that the Gustavus-Adolphus Society has been able to hold its annual session in Bavaria. The time is not very distant when the Protestants of that country were prohibited from having any connexion with this society, either in respect of giving or receiving. Thanks be to God for this progress of liberty! The ancient city of Nuremburg, one of the most remarkable in Germany, will also be an additional and great attraction to these assemblies—always interesting, from the excellent work in which they are engaged on behalf of poor Protestant communities scattered in Catholic countries. This society has for its adversaries in Bavaria, as elsewhere, the ultra-Lutheran pastors, who not only take no part in it themselves, but labour to detach their flocks from it. It is to be hoped that the assembly at Nuremburg will contribute powerfully to dispel these narrow prejudices.

As to the Kirchentag, it was generally feared, some years since, that it had finished its career. It is now, in fact, only a fraternal r union, which, as such, may yet have its utility, but which probably would have already ceased, but for the association of the Inner Mission, with which it has been identified from its origin, under the powerful influence of Dr. Wichern. In times so serious as ours the Kirchentag might yet revive and acquire great importance. To this, however, it is essential first that the seat of the central committee should not be always at Berlin; next, that this committee should not be afraid to place upon the order of the day the true vital questions of the moment; lastly, that instead of occupying the sittings with long and learned dissertations by professors, it should allow free course to unconstrained discussion. We shall see if the approaching assembly will respond to these wishes, so universally felt. On this depends the existence or the death of the Kirchentag. If God permit, I will communicate to your readers the results of these grand assemblies, which will take place, the one at the end of the month of August, the other in September.

TURKEY.

The Rev. G. R. Birch, Secretary of the Turkish Missions Aid Society, kindly forwards to us the following:—

COLLEGE AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

Rev. Dr. Hamlin writes under date of Constantinople, May 2: "I have not yet received my leave to build my college, so as to break ground. The Sublime Porte has granted permission, but an inferior department, which harasses the builders, and is called Canaf, or Trades Union, has not given permission. The part is often greater than the whole in Turkey. I may build the college where I please, and when I please, only no subject of this Government can aid me in any way whatever. This is Turkey! But I still hope to triumph over all these enemies of the truth by patience, perseverance, and prayer."

SYRIAN MISSION.

Rev. Dr. Calhoun, American Missionary, writes:—

"Abeih, Mount Lebanon, June 6.

"We owe your society many thanks for aid to our Theological Seminary—35%. We have entered a class of ten, a more promising one than at any previous period. We shall have also during the summer a few theological students. In addition to the sciences, regular instruction is given in the Scriptures. The interest manifested by pupils in the daily investigation of Bible truth is most encouraging. No hour passes so pleasantly as the one given to the Word of God.

"Mr. Ford is again with us, and has greatly enjoyed communion with Christian friends in England.

"Our work, though not like that among the Armenians, is still steadily progressing. God has a seed even in Syria. The recent commotions, disastrous as they were, have been overruled for good.

"A high school has recently been opened in this village (Abeih), for Druses, to be supported by funds invested in their religious establishments! The number of the pupils is twenty, gathered from all parts of the Druse community. The teacher is a young man of excellent Christian character, and is well qualified for his work. He was educated in our seminary, and is a member of the Church on Lebanon. Though he will not of course be expected or allowed to give religious instruction, yet his influence will be of the right kind, and the whole process will be an enlightening one. I feel much interested in this experiment.

"You will have heard ere this that one of the murderers of the missionary, Mr. Coffing, has been taken. His trial is to take place at once, at Adana.

"I was present at the meeting of our Central Mission at Aleppo, in April. Dr. Goodall, of Constantinople, was there. It was a delightful one, and the evidences are many that the favour of the Lord is with them.

"Yours, "J. H. CALHOUN."

THE AMERICAN MISSION AT AINTAB.

Aintab, Syria, May 26, 1862.

PROGRESS AND PRESENT CONDITION OF THE MISSION.

It is now fifteen years since the first missionary came to this city. As has been the case in other places, so here also, much opposition and persecution were experienced in the beginning. But though this somewhat checked the work, it did not effectually hinder it. Inquiry and investigation continue to spread, and the number of Protestants increase. In 1848 they rose to nearly 100; and from that time to the present there has been a gradual increase of the community, till it has risen to over 2,000, including small and great of both sexes. The members of the Church are now nearly 350; and additions have been made at every regular communion season, sometimes larger and at others smaller. Our Sabbath audience averages about 100 hearers; and among them there are, generally, a few new ones every Sabbath. I am sure it would gladden your heart, could you be here and see this great audience, listening attentively to the preaching of the blessed Gospel. A few years since they were enveloped in the darkness and ignorance of superstition; and yet now are rejoicing in the light of the unadulterated truth. So large has their number now become, that it seems necessary to divide the Church and congregation into two; and this will be done as soon as it can be accomplished conveniently.

NATIVE AGENCY AND EDUCATION.

In the year 1856 a native pastor was settled over the Church, who continues still to labour acceptably in that office. The people have furnished his support from the beginning, with the exception of a short period, and feel much attached to him.

We have eight schools, containing over 600 pupils. The Bible is the text-book, and catechetical instruction is regularly given. Over half of these are the children of Armenian parents; and we have much hope that most of these, as they grow into maturity, will become Protestant, though their parents are not such. The Protestants have borne the proportion of the expenses falling to their own children; and after the present year we hope they will assume that belonging to the Armenian children also.

When the Gospel began to be preached here there were but two Armenian females in the city who could read. A system of instruction for adult females was devised, and by means of that about 300 or more females have learned to read.

We have also a high school, where our native helpers—such as teachers, colporteurs, preachers, and pastors—receive much of their training. As soon as the work had taken root here some of these men went into the vicinity to spread the truth; and often from six to twelve were thus engaged every year. Such of them as were designed to become regular preachers and pastors have been formed into separate classes for a course of instruction in exegesis, systematic theology, and homiletics. As the result of these efforts, thirteen young men have been licensed to preach. Two of them are prevented by peculiar circumstances, at the present time, from labouring; but the remaining eleven are now actively engaged in preaching the Gospel, and four of them have been ordained. We are hoping to see five or six of the remainder ordained over some of our native churches within a year. Another theological class of eight is now being formed. Their education may be completed in a year or two; and if they should all be licensed to preach, there will have been raised up here twenty-one preachers of the Gospel. The raising up and qualifying of a native ministry we regard as a most important and essential part of our work.

SABBATH-SCHOOL INSTRUCTION.

At an early period a Sabbath-school was formed. At first, its numbers were small, but afterwards increased to about 150 pupils, being mostly children. About four years since it began to be enlarged by the addition of infant classes and classes for adults. In this way it gradually increased, until the whole congregation, male and female, young and old, became members of it. The average number of attendants, inclusive of teachers, is from 1,200 to 1,300, and on special occasions it has risen to 1,600 and more. There are some seventy or eighty teachers. Once a month all are brought into the large church (the infant classes are in rooms outside of the church), and then the children sing some of their sweet hymns, and are questioned on what they have been taught, and short addresses are made to them. The scene is one of great and touching interest. I am sure, could you behold this large company of children, and hear their voices in sacred song, and their ready answers to the questions propounded, while all the adults, males and females, fathers and mothers, and in many cases grandparents, are looking on with deep interest, you would exclaim, with a joyful heart, "What hath God wrought!"

ADDITIONS TO THE CHURCH.

The first Sabbath of this month was one of great interest to our people. There were received to the church fifty-two new members, twenty-four males and twenty-eight females.

I have made these statements by way of introducing you to our people, hoping thereby to interest yourself and readers in them, and to secure your and their prayers that the work may spread, and that many more may be gathered into the fold of Christ.

SOUTH AFRICA.

THE MISSION TO THE MATEBELE.

Inyati, Matebele Country,
South Africa, December, 1861.

THE MATEBELE COUNTRY.

Some of your readers may already be acquainted with the name of the tribe to which this communication relates, and may know that an effort is being made to introduce to them the Gospel; but there are, no doubt, still many who may not be unwilling to have their attention directed to one of the less prominent spheres of missionary exertion. My most direct course will be to give, in the first instance, a word or two in reference to our position on the map, so far indeed as it is possible to do so with any certainty. To the south-west our nearest neighbours are a tribe of Bechuanas, called Bamangwato, about 350 miles distant, and midway between this place and Kuruman. To the south-east is the Transvaal Republic. The distance, we have reason to suppose, is about the same as to the Bamangwato. To the east and north-east lie numerous tribes, included by the Matebele under the general name of Mashuna, or Mashina. They are said to inhabit a mountainous country, and have hitherto resisted, with some success, the constant efforts of the Matebele to subjugate them. It is usual for men on foot to come within sight of their mountains on the fourth day from this place, so they are probably something more than a hundred miles from us. How far we are from the sea in this direction I cannot say, nor is it likely that we shall attempt a road to salt water, unless the navigation of the Zambesi be overruled. From this river we are, however, more distant than is generally supposed by those who have been accustomed to connect us in name with the Zambesi Missions, and for the present, at least, we have no road in that direction, owing to the jealousy with which the Matebele view anything like the opening up of their country. It is said that the Victoria Falls are twelve or fourteen days on foot in a north-westerly direction, in which case the river must be further from us direct north, judging as far as one can from the extent to which it trends away from us below the Falls. It is true that we have seen people who affirm that they have come from the Great River in five or six days; but for my own part, I doubt whether they mean the Zambesi, more especially because this name is not well known by them, and they are in the habit of speaking of any considerable stream as the Great River.

This I must confess is not a very definite account of our locality, but is sufficient to give a general idea. It must be borne in mind that no European travellers have hitherto been allowed to enter or leave the country, except on the south side, and that circumstances have not allowed the missionaries to make attempts at exploration.

THE TRIBE AND ITS CHIEF.

The origin of the Matebele, as a distinct tribe, is not very remote, inasmuch as it dates within the lifetime of the present chief, Mosilikatse. He, with a small nucleus of followers, fled from the oppressive rule of Chaka, King of the Zulus, in the neighbourhood of Port Natal. He did not pause until he found himself in the country now occupied by the Transvaal Republic, but then covered with the towns and cattle-posts of numerous Bechuana tribes, whom he easily conquered in detail, plundering them of their children and pastoral wealth. The Bechuanas are an unwarlike, and even cowardly people, and could make no stand against the fierce onsets of the Zulus, who enjoy the advantage of a kind of military organization, and were led by a chief of undoubted courage and ability. After subjugating the tribes with which he came into contact, and spreading terror far and wide, Mosilikatse settled down in a locality about two hundred miles to the north-east of the Kuruman missionary station. At this time he was visited, in the first instance, by my father, the Rev. Robert Moffat, and afterwards by others. He at last came into collision with the Griquas, and then with the Dutch emigrant farmers, which latter pressed him so closely, that he was at length compelled to seek safety in an extended flight, leaving behind him much of the cattle of which he had plundered his neighbours. For a time he disappeared from view, having plunged into what were then the mysterious depths of Central South Africa. Some years elapsed, and almost all had begun to believe that his career had long ended, when something was heard of him through the Dutch elephant-hunters of Natal.

EARLY HISTORY OF THE MISSION.

When Dr. Livingstone's discoveries had opened up regions to the westward, and even further north than the Matebele country, Mosilikatse's existence and locality became matters of certainty, and in the year 1853 the Rev. Robert Moffat paid him another visit, which has resulted in the present attempt to commence a mission. Its history may be summed up in a few words. On the return of Dr. Livingstone to En land, and during the year 1857, the London Missionary Society resolved upon the establishment simultaneously of two stations—one among the Matebele, and another among the Makololo. I need hardly refer to the fact that the latter mission has experienced a severe check, for a time at least, owing to the ravages of the swamp fever. Two agents of the society, the Revs. W. Sykes and T. Thomas, under the guidance of my father (Mr. Moffat), were sent hither, and, after a somewhat tedious journey, arrived towards the end of October, 1859. The writer, by the disinterested aid of a private individual (whose name he does not feel at liberty to mention without leave), was enabled to accompany them, and has enjoyed the privilege of co-operation with them, as a brother in the Lord; but in no official connexion with the society they represent.

The missionary party found Mosilikatse in circumstances which certainly did not quite accord with the dignified conceptions most of them had formed of one whose name has certainly made a noise in South Africa. He was residing at a small cattle outpost, which barely afforded accommodation for those whom he had about him. It consisted of a few very paltry huts clustered about a "Kraal" or cattle-fold, amid the solitudes of a gloomy forest, on the banks of the Impembezi River. Nor was our reception of the most encouraging character. As is not unfrequently the case, we found the reality somewhat more sombre than the prospect had been. We have learned since to account for much that was so incomprehensible at the time as to baffle even the experience of our leader, Mr. Moffat. For a period of about two months our faith and patience were somewhat severely tried by the strange conduct of the chief. We were virtually prisoners in our camp, which afforded us but inadequate shelter from the alternate heavy rains and scorching suns of a tropical summer. We were sometimes destitute of food, for we had come expecting a somewhat different reception, and supposing that to have burdened our already heavily-laden waggons with a large stock of provisions would have been a gratuitous addition to our difficulties in reaching this remote region. In a word, we now learnt how foolish we had been to expect to find in the midst of the darkest heathenism a magnanimous potentate, invested with all the charms of romance.

SETTLEMENT AT INYATI.

About the end of the year matters took a more favourable turn, and we were directed to the town of Inyati. Here we were received by Mosilikatse, who, during the last month of our detention on the Impembezi River, had left us to our own devices, having gone to another place. To our great joy, the chief and his principal attendants met us with many manifestations of friendship, and on the 26th of December, 1859, we unyoked our bullocks for the last time about a mile from the town, in a valley, which was to be our permanent location. The spot is perhaps as suitable as any that could be found without going to the outskirts of the country, which, of course, is incompatible with our purpose as missionaries. It is tolerably central, and, judging from our experience thus far, as healthy as could be expected. We are not, however, blessed with a perennial spring of running water, and our gardens must necessarily lose much of their value as means of subsistence; for the cultivation of European corn and vegetables is carried on under very great difficulties; in fact, during years of drought is impossible. We have found that we cannot, even for a time, without detriment to our health, depend upon the native corn as an article of diet. We have hitherto been compelled to look for our supplies of wheat to the Dutch emigrant farmers in the Transvaal Republic, and to what could be spared from the Kuruman station.

PROGRESS OF THE MISSION.

The progress of the mission up to the present time has been marked by few events. About the end of April, 1860, six months after our arrival in the country, our hearts were relieved of a growing and painful burden, by the commencement of public ministrations to the Matebele, through the medium of interpreters. Until this took place we had never been able to assume our true position as heralds of the Cross. In the month of May the Rev. William Sykes, in accordance with previous arrangements, left on a journey to the colony, whence he has since returned with his wife. Shortly afterwards my father—having fulfilled the object of his journey, in the establishment of the mission, at the cost of much physical and mental labour—started for the Kuruman, accompanied by the last of the people belonging to that station, with the exception of one young man, who was willing to remain for a twelvemonth, and who has fulfilled his engagement with much credit to himself. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas, with myself and wife, were now left fairly abreast of our undertaking. We have had some inconveniences to put up with, and have found ourselves in by no means an easy path, but in all things have been able to recognise the blessed presence of the Lord. Of course the unwonted tax upon the physical energies of some of us—especially the ladies—combined with the precariousness and insufficiency of the help in the way of service we have been able to secure among these raw heathens, and the want at times of food, have much taxed our health and spirits; but we have had none of those deep waters of affliction through which our dear and honoured brethren have had to pass in the Makololo Mission.

DIFFICULTIES OF WORK: ADVERSE INFLUENCE OF THE CHIEF.

What most seriously weighs upon us now is the slowness of our progress. In this respect we need much sympathy and many fervent prayers on the part of your readers. We live in hope, and pray for the pouring out of the Spirit from on High. We have the opportunity of a Sabbath service here for the people of Inyati, and we have also a weekly service in each of two neighbouring villages. The attendance at these is, of course, most uncertain, and there are as yet no signs of the heathen mind opening to the truth. The last few months, indeed, have seemed to indicate a retrograde movement, and we must look forward still for the distant dawn. An iron despotism enthralled the souls as well as the bodies of the Matebele. A man sits in the place of God, dispensing life and death at pleasure, and usurping all homage and reverence. Thus free thought is clouded by the dark terror which broods over the land. Humanly speaking, Mosilikatse must be converted, or at least must learn to respect the Gospel, before it can have free course and be glorified in this country. To us, as young men, he is practically inaccessible. Perhaps the only man to whom he is disposed to listen is my father, and that, of course, more for the sake of the temporal advantages which accrue from his acquaintance, than as the result of any moral influence. To do anything with his people, we need his friendly co-operation. The absence of this is sufficient to make them stand aloof. Mosilikatse has gone on to old age in the possession of despotic power. He is now in his dotage, or very nearly so. You can excuse us for feeling that our time has hardly come, and that until the mighty Spirit of God awakens him from his lethargy, we must wait and pray. Perhaps it is harder to do this than to be engaged in the active duties of missionary work. At present we can do little more than pursue our studies in the language, and seek to extend a friendly influence over the people with whom we come into contact. We are quite alive to the importance of taking hold of the rising generation; but, as will be obvious, a school is as yet out of the question. These things reconcile us, in some measure, to the unavoidable absorption of our time and energies, to a large extent, in secular duties. In a region so secluded, and without native aid of an effective character, this is inevitable.

APPEAL FOR PRAYER.

I had hoped to have told you something about the Matebele people themselves, and matters connected with them, but this letter is already too long. If spared, I may try to do so at some future time. Suffice to say that they are a fine, good-natured, noisy people—heathens, of course, and, like all heathens, slaves of sin; but they have many redeeming qualities, and hardly any one can see much of them without liking them. Even poor old Mosilikatse himself has shown increasing consideration, though his kindness is somewhat fitful and barbarian. May you never be worse treated by your neighbours in good old England than we have hitherto been by the Matebele. I can only recur to the earnest wish that this communication may lead some unknown praying ones in your favoured land to join their petitions with ours. Prayer will help us; then, "brethren, pray for us."—I am, yours respectfully,

JOHN SMITH MOFFAT.

ARRIVAL OF THE REV. WILLIAM ELLIS.

The Rev. William Ellis, of the London Missionary Society, has at length reached the scene of his former labours. Writing from the Mauritius, just before his embarkation for Madagascar, he says: "I am encouraged by the latest accounts from Madagascar in everything excepting the progress of the Catholics at Tamatave; and although their course of proceeding is different from ours, in giving the people money, &c., I admire their zeal in staying through the whole fever season, and persevering under great discouragement." He had just heard of the death of Rambosalama, the heathen cousin and rival of the King. Arriving at Madagascar towards the end of May, on the 24th of that month Mr. Ellis wrote from Tamatave as follows:—

As soon as our ship was at anchor, officers came on board to say that the King's house was prepared for me; also that I should attend a meeting of the Christians to tender God thanks for my safe arrival. About five o'clock I stepped on the beach, where a large crowd of natives were waiting. An officer of the palace, whom his Majesty had sent to meet me, with a native chief, then advanced, and after shaking hands—for I had known him before—made a speech, informing me that he had been sent by the King to conduct me to the capital. To this I replied in the native language, and was then saluted by the people with the wish that I might have favour. The chief then presented a letter from the King as his credentials. This letter informed me of his appointment, and of the King's desire to see me. The secretary added his own pleasure at the prospect of my arrival in the capital; and informed me that Rambosalama, the King's rival, had died on the 21st of April, six days after the date of his previous letter. While I was reading the letters, the other officer commenced a speech in favour of Radama, to which one of the Hovah officers, who had returned with me from Mauritius, replied. The multitude having in the meantime closed around us, with R—, the chief, wearing the pink sash of an officer of the palace, walking on one side, and the officer in blue uniform on the other, followed by many of the foreigners and people, I was led through the principal street to the King's house, where there were great crowds of people, &c. A great number of people had been cleaning the rooms and hanging up mats, &c. As soon as I entered, I was formally presented with the house; but, on looking over it, I perceived there were no beds. Therefore I accepted the provision intended by his Majesty, but deferred taking possession until the next day. More than one offered me accommodation, but I went with the husband of David Johns's daughter to a very nice house in a neat garden, where I had a cordial welcome, a good supper, a nice cup of tea, and a comfortable bed. The next morning two officers came to say that, as they thought I should be more comfortable at the house of the Chief Judge, apartments were provided for me there. This is the best house in the place, and I was conducted to it by a number of officers. I was then installed in a nice large, clean, new pavilion, with a trustworthy servant. Presents of eggs, fowls, ducks, and geese came in abundance, and in the evening a fine fat ox from the Commandant at Tamatave. At seven we sat down to dinner at the Chief Judge's table, where soup, fish, beautiful mullet, curry, and roast meat furnished the repast.

Just as we were finishing, an officer entered the room in haste, to say that the Commandant was frightfully burned by an explosion of gunpowder in his house, and was on his way to have his wounds dressed by me. In a minute or two afterwards his palanquin was brought into my pavilion and put down on the floor, where the chief lay trembling with pain, his face expressive of the greatest agony. A large tin cylinder filled with powder, and left by his predecessor, had exploded, and produced the mischief that extended over his face, arms, and legs. His wife and attendants crowded around while I examined his wounds, which I hoped would not prove dangerous. Requesting that all, excepting his wife and two or three attendants, would withdraw, I pulled off my coat, turned up my sleeves, and, putting on my spectacles, began to wash and dress the wounds, one of the attendants pulling cotton wool out of our mattresses to wrap round his limbs. When I had finished, he expressed great satisfaction. He was then carried back to his own house, all the party loading me with thanks, and saying they did not know what they should have done if it had happened a week ago.

A meeting for thanksgiving on account of my arrival took place in the King's house yesterday afternoon. A goodly number were present. Their prayers were appropriate, earnest, and simple; their singing earnest, and apparently sincere; the reading of the Scriptures very impressive; and the comments plain and pointed. It was Matt. v., as illustrative of blessing following suffering. I then stood up and addressed a few words to them in Malagasy. The leader of the meeting then requested that I would pray. I declined, on the ground of insufficient knowledge of the language. He then said, "Pray in English; the people will like to hear it, and some will understand." I did so, interspersing Malagasy sentences, and closing with the Lord's prayer in that language. Many seemed deeply moved, and numbers walked home with me. You cannot imagine the sensation my arrival has occasioned, and the satisfaction I derive from all I see and all I hear about the Christians.

Miscellaneous Intelligence.

AN ADDRESS TO THE VICEROY OF EGYPT, signed, among others, by the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Bishop of London, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, and the chairman and secretaries of the Evangelical Alliance, has been transmitted to his Highness, thanking him for his determination to act upon the principles of just and benevolent toleration, and for the interposition recently made under his Highness's authority on behalf of a native Christian who was suffering severely from an outbreak prompted by fanaticism, for having undertaken to defend a native woman, herself also persecuted on account of religion. In the course of his reply his Highness expressed himself "both honoured and deeply touched by the sentiments of sympathy" expressed in the address. He adds: "Although it has always been a principle with me to grant an equal protection to all forms of worship, without distinction, the approbation of the distinguished members of your association will be an additional motive with me to persevere in the course which I have traced out for myself."

MURDER OF ANOTHER AMERICAN MISSIONARY.—Hardly have we reported the capture of the murderers of the Rev. J. Coffing, before the telegraph bring news of the equally brutal assassination of another member of the same excellent brotherhood. The Rev. W. Meriam, an agent of the American Board of Missions, stationed at Phillipopoli, who had been lately accompanied to Constantinople by his wife, left in the beginning of last week on his return to his station, and after a short halt at Adrianople, had arrived within three hours (nine miles) of Phillipopoli, when the little party was attacked by brigands, and Mr. Meriam brutally murdered. Till yesterday the intelligence had only reached the capital in brief telegraphic form, and we are therefore unable to do more than report that the widow of the unhappy gentleman finally succeeded in reaching her desolate home, and the authors of the crime are as yet at large.—Levant Herald, July 9.

MORTALITY AMONG AMERICAN MISSIONARIES.—The Christian Intelligencer (U.S.) of June 26 says: "The number of deaths among the missionaries of the American Board, within the last few months, has been very unusual. A period of less than five months, it will be noticed, is embraced in the following summary: Rev. Elijah C. Bridgman, D.D., Shanghai, Nov. 2; Mr. Edward Breath, Persia, Nov. 18; Mrs. F. M. McKinney, South Africa, Nov. 26; Rev. William C. Shipman, Sandwich Islands, Dec. 21; Mrs. Sarah L. Powers, Central Turkey, Jan. 2; Rev. H. D. O. Dwight, D.D., Western Turkey, Jan. 25; Miss Cynthia Farrar, Western India, Jan. 25; Mrs. Jane W. Ireland, South Africa, Jan. 25; Mrs. Ann S. Andrews, Sandwich Islands, Jan. 27; Mrs. Sarah W. W. Deane, Micronesia, Feb. 16; Rev. Jackson G. Coffing, Central Turkey, March 25."

MISSIONARY MOVEMENT IN SWEDEN.—The Church Missionary Society's monthly paper for July states that the Rev. Gustav Beskow, pastor at Stockholm, at present on a visit to London, was lately introduced to the committee, and gave some very interesting details as to the missionary movement at present going forward in Sweden. The revival of religion in that country has given rise to a voluntary missionary association within the Church, but separate from its organization, for both home and foreign objects, its members having resolved that, instead of providing men for other m sionary bodies, they would establish a mission of their own. In no less than 150 parishes, composed of peasants, a day in each week has been set apart for work and contributions, the women supplying knitted articles to the stock. One parish had thus supplied more than 1,000 rix-dollars (50%) in the year.

DEATH OF THE REV. J. HOBSON, OF SHANGHAI.—We regret to state that accounts have been received of the death of the Rev. J. Hobson, British chaplain, Shanghai, of typhus fever, on the 30th of April, at Nangastaki, in Japan, whither he had gone with Mrs. Hobson for a brief visit.

M. BERTHOLET-BRIDEL, one of the pastors of the Evangelical Church of Geneva, died, we regret to say, on the 2nd of July last. His age was fifty-two. M. Bertholet was widely known and respected.

THE GENEVA MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—We have given, in a previous page, an account of the anniversary of the Evangelical Society of Geneva. We may here mention that the other religious societies have held their annual meetings in that city, and that they appear to have left behind them a pleasing impression. The Missionary Society raised an aggregate of 56,000f. during the year. This amount was divided principally among the Basle, Paris, and Moravian Missionary Societies.

DEDICATION OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH AT BAR-LE-DUC.—Among the churches which had no existence a quarter of a century ago, but are now rising in importance from day to day (says the Bulletin du Monde Chrétien), that of Bar-le-Duc, chief town of the department of the Meuse, stands high on the list. The church, without doubt the prettiest we have yet seen, was consecrated to the Lord's service on Sunday morning, the 25th of May. In spite of the menaces of the Romish clergy, who had threatened to excommunicate all those of their flocks who should take part in the Reformed worship, a great eagerness was manifested by the multitude to assist at this solemn ceremony. At the first service, Pastor Cuvier, of Metz, representative of the Consistory of Nancy, gave to a crowded congregation an interesting discourse, in which he related some historical facts concerning the Protestants of the Meuse during the 15th century, and then pronounced the prayer appointed for the dedication. Pastor G. Monod, of Paris, afterwards preached an excellent sermon from John iii. 30. At half-past two o'clock a crowd, not less considerable than that in the morning, had long been pressing into the sanctuary.

Pastor Pruvôt, from Verdun, and Pastor Prunier, from Joinville, each addressed the congregation. M. Recordon, the pastor of Troyes, who writes these lines, afterwards occupied the pulpit, calling the attention of the flock to the well-known words of our Saviour addressed to St. Peter in Matt. xvi. 18, "Thou art Peter," &c., &c. At eight o'clock a third service was celebrated by M. Larcher, pastor of Nauroy, who took for his text these words: "Be ye thankful." (Col. iii. 15.) He told them that when a child at Bar, he had attended one of the services addressed by an evangelist to a handful of hearers in a small room. He was then ignorant even of the name of the book from which such touching and serious words emanated, having till then been brought up in the Church of Rome. He had seen with joy the progress of that feeble Church at its commencement, and now so visibly blessed of God, for at this present time it numbered about 400 members, including those in the environs. He added that it was not without emotion and deep gratitude to God that he, and no doubt all the members of the flock of Christ, witnessed on that day the dedication of this beautiful place of worship. He exhorted his hearers to show forth the fruits of gratitude, by practising and propagating their faith. As ten o'clock struck the assembly rose and sung a hymn of thanksgiving, and thus closed the happy day. The Rev. C. de Boivinville, a pastor equally revered and beloved, presides over this interesting church. The whole cost of the ground and building was 1,830l., to meet which the sum of 1,400l. has been raised, including 340l. most kindly contributed by friends in England, leaving a deficiency of 430l. The friends of Protestant and Evangelical religion in France will doubtless help the little band of Protestants in Bar to clear off this debt. But they are comparatively few in number, and far from rich, and they have already contributed to the undertaking very liberally. Will not the friends of truth in this rich and favoured land come forward to aid them again, in the spirit of Christian love and sympathy? We shall cheerfully transmit any contributions which may be forwarded to us for this purpose. Contributions will also be received by the Rev. D. Wilson, Islington; Rev. J. Venn, Hereford; Rev. J. C. Harrison, 24, Queen's-road, Regent's-park; Rev. Wm. Arthur, Centenary Hall, Bishopsgate-street; and Messrs. Herries, Farquhar and Co., St. James-street, S.W.

Literature.

The Providence of God, Viewed in the Light of Holy Scripture. By THOMAS JACKSON. John Mason.

THE tendency of this materialist age appears to be to ignore a special or ever-present Providence. Whether Deism and general laws, or Pantheism, or Atheism, be theoretically adopted, the practical result is to abstract creation and human affairs from the superintendence and control of a Personal God. Nothing can be in more direct antagonism to all such views than the Holy Bible. In those sacred pages the Living God is always, everywhere, directing, overruling, punishing, rewarding, observing, and influencing; abasing the proud, exalting the humble, taking cognisance equally of armies and empires, of kings and great men, and of poor and insignificant individuals. Let it be supposed for a moment that the Bible is a fabrication and a fable; on what rational principle is it that fabricators and fabulists, not writing acknowledged fiction, but telling lies in hypocrisy, should adopt a method so conducive to virtue, public order, private happiness, and universal morality. The "Thou God seest me" of Hagar is as well a comfort to the afflicted as a stimulus to noble effort and a bridle upon sin. Joseph's "How can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" is a similar instance. Samuel's oracle to Eli, "Them that honour me I will honour, and they who despise me shall be lightly esteemed;" David's xci. and cxxxix., and numerous other Psalms, showing the Divine attributes to be all operating in favour of good and against evil; not merely in a misty and universal way, but in special minute individual instances—all tend to foster righteousness and happiness; and, in harmony with all Scripture, represent the doctrine of a Divine Providence as an undoubted truth, and not merely as a useful figment. Mr. Jackson's book is a timely and popular treatise upon this subject. His examples are deduced from the Scriptures only. He tells us he has endeavoured to combine brevity with comprehensiveness; and we rather think the fault of his book is attempting too much within the limits, so that there is a feebleness in some of the topics.

The Future. An Outline of Events Predicted in the Holy Scriptures, &c. By the Rev. JOHN COX. Nisbet and Co.

A LITTLE book of the usual style and stamp on the Premillennial advent hypothesis, "literal" interpretation, future destiny of Israel after the flesh, and all that sort of thing. It ceases to be amazing, and has become amusing, to observe the mutual astonishment of opposing theorists at each other's impenetrability. The old things on both sides (or all sides rather, as they are many) keep continually cropping up in hopeless antagonism. Arguments the most opposite are respectively urged as "demonstrative;" which to us appear best illustrated by the old cynic picture of "milking the he goat into a sieve."

Sermons by Jabez Bunting, D.D. Vol. II. John Mason.

THESE sermons are fully equal—individual preference may, indeed, pronounce some of them superior—to those contained in the preceding volume, which was noticed by us some months since. They appear in various degrees of completeness. Here is the well-known sermon upon "Justification by Faith," in all its amplitude; and here also is one on Proverbs xxiv. 10, "The Cause of Fainting under Trial," or rather so barely an outline thus entitled, that, under one head, within some half-dozen lines, there are disposed of almost as many subdivisions of the discourse. This last case, however, is somewhat exceptional. For the most part, the discourses are given with sufficient fulness for the ordinary reader, and will be none the less likely to be acceptable generally, though such persons as heard any of them delivered may wish that it had been possible to possess them at greater length. The fact is, that to those who can bring to the perusal of these sermons a personal recollection of Dr. Bunting, in his best days, as a preacher, the book will have a charm which none else can know. The earnest and impressive tones, the dignified demeanour, the natural and impressive eloquence, which spoke not only in words, but in every feature and gesture, and which at once commanded attention, and ensured respect,—the recollection, more or less distinct, of these, may, to some readers, clothe the sermons before us with a glow of life which it were in vain to expect others to realise. But as all this exists only for those whose pleasures of memory are not transferable, the sole means the present generation possess of estimating the place occupied by

Dr. Bunting in the pulpit is by the volumes now issued. They convey as accurate an idea of his powers as a preacher as the circumstances of the case admit, though that idea will necessarily be inadequate. That they contain a full exhibition of the great verities of the Gospel, in its saving and sanctifying power, it is almost superfluous to add: this was undoubtedly one of the sources of Dr. Bunting's great popularity among the Wesleyan Methodists; for he had achieved a high reputation as a preacher before he took the lead he long occupied in the Conference.

Words of Life's Last Years; containing Christian Emblems, Metrical Prayers, and Sacred Poems. Translated from Foreign Writers, by the Author of "Thoughts on Devotion," &c., &c. Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

THE prose "emblems" of this little volume contain many sweet, and some brilliant ideas; and the tone is spiritual and edifying, as well as interesting to the feelings and imagination. The metrical prayers are, we think, in false taste, unnatural, and unsuitable in the English language. Some of the sacred poems are good.

The Complete Works of Richard Sibbes, D.D. Edited, with Memoir, by the Rev. ALEXANDER B. GROBART (Corresponding Member Society of Antiquaries of Scotland), Kinross. Vol. I. Containing "The Description of Christ," "The Bruised Reed and Smoking Flax," &c. Edinburgh: James Nichol.

THIS first volume of the works of the celebrated Dr. Sibbes is in continuation of the reprints of the Puritan divines in Nichols's valuable series, now rapidly issuing from the press. It is stated in the preface that Dr. Sibbes has had no preceding editor of his complete works; though many editions, more or less accurate, of separate treatises have made his name popular for generations. This lack of previous authentic editions has greatly increased the editor's labours, and is pleaded in behalf of any shortcomings; but so far as can be judged, the editor has little reason to excuse himself. His task seems remarkably well performed, and his memoir of Sibbes, though excused as also labouring under a similar deficiency of copious authentic materials, will be found comprehensive, interesting, and satisfactory. In this age, when we hear so much of the impatience of hearers of sermons of half-an-hour or forty-five minutes long, it is curious to read the deeply-spiritual and minutely-experimental works of the "heavenly" Sibbes, and to learn that such were his ordinary sermons. Is the fault now with hearers or preachers, or both? At all events, a baptism of the spirit of these works, whatever may be done with the form of them, could not fail to profit both hearers and preachers of our own day.

Theological and Homiletical Commentary on the Gospel of St. Luke. Specially Designed and Adapted for the Use of Ministers and Students. From the German of J. J. VAN OOSTERZEE, D.D. Edited by J. P. LANGE, D.D., Professor of Divinity in the University of Bonn. Translated by SOPHIA TAYLOR. Vol. I. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark.

WE are glad to see another volume of this series issued by the Messrs. Clark. It is a worthy companion to the commentary on St. Matthew, written by Dr. Lange himself, which we reviewed in our May number. We hope to be able to notice this work at length when the translation is completed; meanwhile we cordially recommend the commentary of Dr. Van Oosterzee to all lovers of Biblical studies. Clergymen will find it very useful in their preparations for the pulpit.

History of the Development of the Doctrine of the Person of Christ. By Dr. J. A. DORNER, Professor of Theology in the University of Gottingen. Division First, First Four Centuries. Vol. I. Translated by W. L. ALEXANDER, D.D., Edinburgh, and (notes) D. W. SIMON. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. And Vol. II. Translated by Rev. D. W. SIMON. Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark.

THE first volume of the Second Division of Dr. Dörner's work was reviewed in the number of our journal for July of last year. We must postpone for the present any further notice of this great work, which is one of the most valuable contributions to theological literature translated from the German into English.

Scriptural Coincidences, or Traits of Truth. By J. DUNCAN CRAIG, M.A., Curate Perpetual of Temple Brady, Diocese of Cork. S. Bagster and Sons.

IN this little treatise we have a selection of undesigned coincidences from both the Old and New Testament, supporting from internal evidence the genuineness of Scripture, after the manner of Paley and others. As the writer says, this is an argument peculiarly suited to the present time; but all depends upon the judgment displayed in the selection and the conclusiveness of the instances. The majority of instances in the present treatise will commend themselves to most readers. There are some, however, which seem rather fanciful than conclusive. But the book will be profitable as a whole, and will help to an interesting mode of examining the Scriptures.

Selections from the Prose Writings of John Milton. Edited by the Rev. S. MANNING. (Bunyan Library.) Heaton and Son.

THE plan adopted in the preparation of this volume has been to arrange Milton's treatises in chronological order, and to give selections from each, so that the progress of his opinions may be seen by a comparison of the various passages. To each treatise the editor has prefixed a brief introduction, narrating the circumstances which called it forth, and giving such a summary of its contents as may serve to suggest the connexion and logical sequence of the extracts which follow. A few notes are added to explain obsolete and technical terms or allusions. Prefixed to the selections is a memoir, in which the great poet is claimed as a Baptist—though that he "was actually in membership with any Baptist Church cannot be proved." The book has a Bicentenary bias, and among the principles which have guided the editor in making his selections is not only the intrinsic excellence of the passages, and the light they throw upon Milton's character, but their "bearing on the controversies of the present day."

The City of the Great King. N. Algar.

A HEAVY volume of about three thousand five hundred lines of blank verse; divided not into either books, cantos, stanzas, or other breaks. After dinner, we doubt not, a comfortable doze would be the result of an attempt at perusal by most readers, as by ourselves.

Self-Culture. An Essay for the Present Time. By the Rev. G. R. WYNNE. Dublin: Geo. Herbert.

THIS brochure is the production of a superior mind. Its chief aim is to stir up the professors of Evangelical truth to a higher intellectual culture. It well deserves the attentive perusal of divinity students especially, and will be of use to general readers also.

"Put Me in Remembrance." being Family Prayer for a Fortnight. By A. LAYMAN. With an Introductory Notice by the Rev. W. PAKENHAM WALSH, A.M., Chaplain of Sandford. Second Edition. Dublin: George Herbert.

A VOLUME of Evangelical prayers suitable for family use. Though not very striking in their character, and occasionally defective in their verbiage, we have no doubt these family prayers will be found useful. The book is neatly printed and "got up."

"TOPLADY OR CHARLES WESLEY?"

Dr. Osborn, of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, has kindly furnished an answer to the queries in our last number. He writes:—

1. The verse beginning "O disclose Thy lovely face," which now heads the hymn No. 156 of Wesley's "Collection for the Use of the People Called Methodists" (the ordinary hymn-book), will be found published for the first time in the same collection as "Christ, whose glory fills the skies"—viz., "Hymns and Sacred Poems by J. and C. Wesley," 1740; the latter on p. 24, the former on p. 60. As found there, "O disclose Thy lovely face" is the second verse of a hymn entitled "My soul gaspeth for Thee as a thirsty land," beginning "Lord, how long, how long shall I?"

2. The hymn "Christ, whose glory fills the skies," No. 531 of the Methodist "Collection," was first published in "Short Hymns on Select Passages of the Holy Scriptures," by C. Wesley, and will be found pp. 48-49 of vol. 2 of that work (Ed. Bristol, 1762.)

3. All these hymns—the two beginning with the same line, and the third, in which "O disclose Thy lovely face" occurs—are doubtless the work of one or other of the Wesleys, and most likely of Charles Wesley. No one else published them previously—they are quite in his style—nor have they been claimed for others, except for Toplady, whose claim no one who knew their history could have put forward. That they occur in his works proves nothing, except that his editor was not well informed on this subject. Four or five more of Wesley's hymns are found among his poems in the edition of his works published in 1828, though they are very properly removed from the last edition published by Mr. Sedgewick; and in his collection of hymns for the use of his congregation it is well known that Toplady made very large use of the Wesley poetry, which he greatly admired, and imitated so successfully, that very able men have sometimes been unable to distinguish the productions of the Calvinist from those of the Arminian.

4. You are quite correct in saying that the hymn as you first printed it must have been the original. Toplady has transcribed it with its true title, "A Morning Hymn;" but John Wesley printed it as a hymn for "mourners convinced of sin," and therefore substituted a more appropriate first verse. It strikes me that there has been no "slaughter" here, but rather a triumph of his constructive skill and editorial judgment, of which the general Methodist collection would supply many similar instances.

Monthly Retrospect.

HOME.

AN attempt was made by the Bishop of Oxford to relax the bond by which the Church of England is kept under the supremacy of the Crown. The occasion was a plausible one. In the new life that has been awakened in the Christian Church, the duty of sending missions to the heathen assumes an ever-deepening importance. Each Church, of course, does her share of the work in her own way; and the way of the Church of England is, wherever practicable, to send out a bishop, with a staff of clergy, deacons, and the full equipment of an episcopate, to the heathen. It is well known that the Crown, which means the laity of the country, claims the right of appointing bishops at home, and that without a licence from the Crown the election of a bishop cannot be proceeded with. The question is, whether the same rule should apply in the nomination of bishops in those countries that do not owe allegiance to the Sovereign. The object of the bill which the Bishop brought into Parliament was to settle that question in favour of the Church. The vigilant Lord Chancellor, however, the keeper of the Queen's conscience, and her special adviser in all matters relating to the Church, was at his post, and objected to the bill, as trenching on the Royal supremacy. After some rather sharp passages between these two eminent men, as touching the exact boundaries between the spiritual and temporal power, the Bishop was reluctantly compelled to withdraw his bill.

The decisions last month of the Privy Council, and of Dr. Lushington, in the Court of Arches, on matters of doctrine, have given rise to much discussion and comment during the month that has just elapsed. The Rev. Dunbar Heath, who had appealed from the decision of the Lower Court to the Higher, and there had his sentence of deprivation confirmed, has ever since been writing letters to the newspapers, quibbling about verbal meanings, and unable to understand the justice of the sentence which, he says, has deprived him of his living, because he persists in using the English language in its plain and natural meaning. It is but right to say, however, that in scarcely any other quarter is the justice of the sentence impugned. As to the judgment pronounced in the matter of Dr. Williams and Mr. Wilson, just as we are going to press we learn that another stage in the proceedings has been reached. On the 25th ult., Dr. Phillimore, representing the Bishop of Salisbury, the promoter of the suit, appeared before the Judge of the Arches Court, and brought in the reformed articles as directed in the judgment previously delivered. The articles were admitted by the Court as reformed, without any opposition on the part of the defendant, and a month's leave given to the defendant to bring in his defensive allegation. The same course was adopted in the case of the Rev. John Fendall v. the Rev. H. B. Williams.

There was a congress held at Oxford, on Church matters, in the course of last month. It consisted of a number of gentlemen, clerical and lay, who took an interest in the affairs of the Church; or who, in plainer language, had theories and crotchets of their own to support on Church matters; and much

- resembled the Social Science Congress that met in London a short time before. The meeting had its interest, however, on account of its comprehensive character; all parties meeting on common ground—Broad, High, and Low Church had all their representatives; the upholders of the Liturgy as it is, with those who seek a revision. Of course the action of the meeting evaporated in talk; the different schemes of Church reform were all discussed in turn, and nothing was done in any. Perhaps, however, the personal and familiar intercourse that ensued tended to place the rival sects that struggle for mastery within the Established pale in better humour with each other; and on one point they were all agreed—not to suffer any invasion of the Church's rights and privileges from the Dissenting denominations.

The Right Hon. Lord John George Beresford, Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of all Ireland, died in the course of the past month, in his eighty-ninth year. He has been a bishop for fifty-seven years, and Primate for forty. He was a bishop long before the division of the Church into its present party denominations, and it might be difficult to state with precision on his doctrinal views; but, in the practical duties of his high position, no man whispered a word against his Grace. His charities were unbounded, and he was loved and respected by all parties. Once only, we believe, was he assailed by calumny, when, despairing of any alteration being made in the system of national education, to which he had been long opposed, he advised those of his clergy who could not otherwise maintain their schools to accept the aid of Government.

Nonconformity has also lost two of its ornaments within the last few weeks—the Rev. Dr. Leifchild, and the Rev. George Clayton. Dr. Leifchild was the son of a Wesleyan local preacher; but he early cast in his lot among the Independents; one of the leading Wesleyan preachers, it is said, after hearing an exposition of the young man's views, himself recommending the change. He was first settled as pastor of a congregation at Kensington, after which he went to Bristol; but in 1830 he took the charge of Craven Chapel, Regent-street, with which his name is indissolubly associated, and where he remained till a few years before his death, when his increasing infirmities induced him to resign his charge. He did not publish much, but his success as a preacher was remarkable. Mr. Clayton was the son of an Independent minister, and one of three brothers, all of the same sacred calling. Occupying for more than half a century the pulpit of the Congregational Chapel, York-street, Walworth, he was well known as an earnest, eloquent, and successful preacher. He retired from the active duties of the ministry a few years ago. Both Dr. Leifchild and Mr. Clayton were decidedly catholic in their sympathies. The former was especially active in the movements towards Christian Union which resulted in the formation of the Evangelical Alliance, and the latter was distinguished by his warm and constant attachment to the Bible Society.

English Christians have not been stinted in their hospitality to their brethren from abroad who have come over to the International Exhibition. Early in the month a conversazione was held in Willis's Rooms, at which the Bishop of London presided, and to which Evangelical pastors of all denominations were invited. The Foreign Evangelisation Committee held a similar meeting later in the month, to which all foreign clergymen were invited, and which was made remarkable by the presence of two Nestorians, a priest and a deacon, who had travelled on foot all the way from Ooromiah, in Persia, to England, moved by the fame that had reached them of English hospitality, and the necessities of their countrymen. The meeting was much interested in their appearance, and it is to be hoped they will have no cause to regret their journey.

It is not often that the Episcopal Church of Scotland emerges into public notice. The resignation of the venerable Bishop of Edinburgh, however, of his office as Primus of the Episcopate, imposed upon his colleagues the duty of electing a successor. Their choice fell upon the Bishop of Ross. The new Primus showed his activity by summoning a General Synod of the Church, which was numerously attended, and at which several questions affecting the interests of the body were discussed. Among those that were of moment to the outside world, was the question of admission of the laity as members of the Synod. The Lower House sent up a proposition that each congregation should return a representative to the Synod, and that their votes should be taken as a separate order from the clergy. But the proposition did not meet with much favour from the Upper House; the principal argument being that the laity did not want the privilege. A much more important decision was adopted by the same Synod. Our readers are aware that the original Communion-office of the Scottish Church strongly savours of the Romish Mass, and has given offence to more than one pious member of the Church of England. Some time ago it was decided that the Scotch office should be held to be the law of the Church, but that the English office might be used if the majority in a congregation required it. At the present congress, after a lengthened argument, the position of the two offices has been reversed—the English office is to be the rule, and the Scotch office to be used only where the majority of a congregation is in its favour.

The well-known Cardross case, in connexion with the Free Church of Scotland, was decided by the Court of Session in the course of the month. It may be well to state here that the General Assembly of the Free Church had deposed Mr. M'Millan from his office as minister of the congregation at Cardross, for irregularities; that Mr. M'Millan contended he had been wrongfully deposed, and appealed to the civil courts for redress. The Free Church, and most of the Dissenting bodies in Scotland, contended that this intrusion of the civil courts into the review of spiritual judgments was an invasion of the liberties of non-established Churches; and the main argument of the case before the judges was on that ground. The Court, however, have decided it upon quite other grounds. They took up a preliminary objection, to the effect that the General Assembly of the Free Church was not a body known in law, that could sue and be sued; that Mr. M'Millan, therefore, was wrong in bringing his action against the Assembly as a body, but that he should have brought it against the several members composing that Assembly by name; and on that ground they dismissed the case. It is said Mr. M'Millan means to renew his action, putting in the names of all the members of the Assembly that agreed in his deposition.

The distress in the manufacturing districts has reached an afflicting point, and there is no prospect of an improvement during the coming winter. The conduct of the starving people is above all praise; there is not the ruffle of existing order, nor any sign of discontent throughout the whole district. The people are content to wait and to suffer patiently, for they know that the upper classes of the country are not responsible for their sufferings, and that they will do all in their power to relieve them. This latter anticipation is beginning to be realised. There have been local subscriptions from the first; but an influential meeting of Lancashire gentlemen was held, about the middle of the month, at the house of the Earl of Ellesmere, in London, which was numerously attended, and 10,000*l.* was subscribed on the spot, to be distributed among those who might not like to apply for parochial aid. In Parliament, also, the Government have introduced a measure giving an overburdened parish power to call upon the union of which it forms a part for help; and giving to a distressed union the same right to call for help from the county. It is to be hoped that these measures will prevent actual starvation, and that the prompt assistance afforded by the rich to the poor will issue in the knitting together of all classes in a common brotherhood.

FOREIGN.

The intelligence received from America continues to be of the most afflictive nature. There are no signs of the speedy termination of the war; the late events have rather tended to prolong its horrors; for the South has been encouraged of late by great and striking successes, while the North shows no disposition to acquiesce in a disruption of the Union. A great disaster has befallen the main Federal army, under General M'Clellan. For some time past he has been inactive, complaining of being outnumbered, and requiring reinforcements, which were sent very sparingly to him, if at all. On the 26th of last month the right wing of his army was attacked by a strong body of Confederates, under General Jackson. General M'Clellan then began the difficult and dangerous operation of moving the right wing of his army behind his left—folding up his force, as it were, into half the space it occupied before. But the roads were few, the swamps many, the enemy in front daring and determined; and the losses, in consequence, appear to have been frightful. It took the army six entire days to march seventeen miles; and on each of these days the wearied, hungry, fever-stricken Federals had to repel furious attacks of their opponents, whose numbers were ever reinforced by fresh regiments, and who made desperate struggles to get between the Federals and the James River, whither they were marching. Had they succeeded, the whole army must have surrendered, as there was at one time a report they were about to do. They were kept back by hard fighting, but every night the Federals had to retreat, losing their guns, burning their stores, and leaving their dead and wounded in the hands of the enemy. The loss in men, stores, and guns must have been prodigious; and the Confederates, too, must have suffered fearfully; but there is no trustworthy record of the loss on either side. Just before these battles the President had called for a new levy of 300,000 men; but the recruits come in slowly, and there is talk of having recourse to conscription. There is a general gloom in the North, while the Southern success appears to have stirred up the Southerners to fresh exertions. In the Border States of Kentucky and Tennessee there is great excitement; and in the latter State the Confederates are overpowering their opponents, and threaten Nashville, the capital, where the Protestant clergy were lately sent to gaol, because they refused to take the new oath of allegiance to the North. In the neighbourhood of New Orleans, also, where General Butler, by his "infamous" proclamation, has done so much mischief to the Federal cause, the Confederates are stirring, and have captured Baton Rouge, with its garrison, within eighty miles of the capital. It will be seen, therefore, that the war fever rages fiercer and hotter than ever. It is said that France and Russia are about to make an effort to stop it, by recognising the independence of the South. A motion to the same effect was made in the House of Commons; but it was not pressed, Parliament preferring to leave the question in the hands of the Government.

The ill success of the French expedition to Mexico, as shown by recent despatches, has awakened the attention of the people to the causes and objects of the war; and it is now generally believed that, under the many pretexts that from time to time have been put forward, the real purpose was to gratify the priest party, by restoring the ascendancy of the Church in that fine, but misguided country. The discovery of this intention does not tend to reconcile the people to the expedition, or to the priests, who are its real authors; and it was made in time to spoil a series of grand demonstrations that had been arranged to welcome back to their respective dioceses the bishops and cardinals who had gone to take part in the canonization of the Japanese martyrs, and of those other secret political conferences which were the real objects of the meeting. In one or two places, particularly at Nismes, as will be seen from the interesting letter of our correspondent, there was a good deal of that display and scenic effect of which the Church is so great a mistress; and a good deal of factitious enthusiasm was the result; but in most cases these high dignitaries were allowed to return as quietly as they went. A greater subject for scandal has been afforded in a speech made in the Senate by Cardinal Matthieu, the Archbishop of Besançon, who opposed a proposition made by the Government to grant retiring pensions to aged priests. "No," said the Cardinal; "it is for the clergy to set the example of bearing cheerfully the privations of poverty; and they will do so." The object of this high-flown sentiment plainly was to keep the clergy dependent on the bishops. Among the Protestants it will be seen, by the letters of our correspondents and otherwise, that progress is making, small but solid in each case. We refer to the opening of new chapels in various districts, and to the interesting letter describing the ceremonial at the opening of the church for the Protestant soldiers at the Camp of Chalons.

The intelligence from Italy is in many respects interesting. The recognition of the kingdom by Russia and Prussia, and the prospect of its being recognised by Spain—nay, perhaps by Austria herself—is, in one point of view, extremely gratifying; but in another it is felt by her statesmen to be embarrassing, as it imposes upon her, tacitly indeed, but not less effectually, the obligation to conduct herself as an established State, not like one in a state of revolution. Italy, in the flux and convulsion of revolution, might seize Rome or invade Venetia. Italy, as an admitted member of the great European family, must respect her neighbour's landmarks. It is surmised that these cobweb threads of diplomacy have been thrown round her for the very purpose of binding her down to keep the peace; with what success remains to be seen. In the meantime, the quarrel between the Italians and the adherents of the Pope grows wider every day. The bishops side with the Pope; the parish clergy and many of the monks with the people. The country clergy of the diocese of Brescia lately replied in a spirited manner to their bishop, who had forbidden them to sing the "Te Deum" on the anniversary of Italian independence. They asked why they who taught the people to thank God for all blessings were not to thank Him for the blessing of liberty. It is no wonder that the priests should adhere to the cause of the Government, for they will participate not only in the general emancipation of the people, but in their freedom from bonds peculiar to themselves. Thus, there is a bill now before the Italian Parliament, requiring that when a bishop suspends a priest from his functions for political reasons, he shall maintain him out of the episcopal treasury. A still more daring blow at the Romish supremacy has been aimed. A member of the Parliament proposed a law legalising the marriage of priests. He does not propose to interfere with the law of the Church, that no priest shall marry; he simply says, if a priest chuses to run the risk of disobeying the Church, and entering into matrimony, let not the State forbid him, as she does now. Let us not interfere with the Church's laws, but let us not lend her the aid of the civil power to enforce them. It was agreed to delay this measure until the whole question of the state of the marriage law shall, as it soon must, come before the House. Amidst a host of interesting facts and reflections of varied interest, furnished by our Italian correspondent, for which we must refer to his letter, our readers will be pleased to meet with the prediction, that ere long the Italian nation will be ready for the major excommunication, and will make a clean riddance of Papal authority.

In all countries where the stifling of religious and political life has been the rule it is not surprising that men should discern a peculiar significance in every popular movement. Thus, our correspondent at Frankfort reports that the great rifle competition which has been going on there has been made the medium of expressing a wish for national unity, which we at home should never have thought of attributing to our rifle competitions at Wimbledon. But there can be no question that the desire to make Germany one, independent, and free, after the fashion of Italy, is every year growing in intensity, and it will be well if, as our correspondent remarks, the people determine to accomplish their object by peaceable means. It is to be lamented that the religious feeling does not keep pace with the political. The great days of rejoicing in honour of the meeting were on two different occasions fixed for Sunday; and on the latter day all celebration of religious worship was wholly impossible. These politicians, we suppose, never will learn what a weight and stolidity is given to all national institutions by the due observance of the Lord's-day; and, after all, it is not so much a question for politicians as for the people—for, unless the people are trained to keep the Sabbath-day, laws to compel them will be of little use. The great question of religious liberty is in the course of being fought out in Wurtemberg, where it appears that Baptists, Wesleyans, and other denominations, with whom we are so familiar at home, are more aggressive than is agreeable to the National Church, which in retaliation uses the weapons of the civil arm. There, again, is a lesson Germany might well learn from England. But we cannot expect that other nations should comprehend intuitively lessons which it took us centuries of hard and painful struggle to learn.

The news from Syria this month is of more than ordinary interest. The progress of the Gospel among the native population here is great and striking; especially at Aintab, where a missionary was first placed fifteen years ago, and where in 1848 a church was formed consisting of 100 members. That community has now risen to 2,000 persons, the members of the church being 350; and on the first Sabbath of last May, fifty-two communicants were received, after an unusually searching examination. The work of education is unceasingly attended to; and there is a college from which have proceeded eleven native preachers of the Gospel. Equally interesting is the news from the Lebanon, where the Druses have so far overcome their prejudices, as to consent to the opening of a school in one of their villages, and to defray the expense of its management out of the funds devoted to their religious establishments. Of course no proselytising is allowed; but the teacher is a young man of excellent Christian character; and the very presence of such a man in such a community must exercise an influence for good. Dr. Hamlyn writes from Constantinople that he has obtained permission from the Sultan to build a college in that city, but that the work is impeded by obstacles thrown in the way by a body which appears, in its obstructiveness, to resemble some of our own trades unions in England.

An interesting letter will be found in our intelligence from the Rev. John Smith Moffat, narrating the history of the mission to an African tribe, called the "Matebele." From the Central African Mission, founded by the two Universities, in connexion with the discoveries of Dr. Livingstone, there come tidings of great distress. Bishop Mackenzie and one of his clergy, the Rev. Mr. Burrup, died of fever, about the beginning of the year. The news of their death came only in time to sadden the general meeting of the mission, which had previously been fixed to take place in the course of the past month. And this was not all. With his death came his journals and other records of his brief episcopal life; and the friends of the mission were scandalised to find that, on more than one occasion, bishop and clergy both had headed the friendly tribe among whom they were located in the repelling of an attack made on them by a party of slave-hunters. This has caused deep grief and lamentation to Dr. Pusey, and men of his school, who broadly lay down the principle that Christian missionaries ought not to engage even in defensive war. But may they not engage in war to protect helpless beings committed to their care? The point is a nice one, and it deserves the consideration of other men than Dr. Pusey.

The Rev. Mr. Ellis, who was formerly a missionary on the island of Madagascar, and who, since the death of the Queen of the island, left England to resume his labours there, has landed on the island. He writes to say that he had a cordial welcome, and was glad to recognise several of his old friends. The most formidable obstacle to the spread of Christianity, he thinks, is not so much the Romish missionaries, who, however, are very active there, as the uncontrolled introduction of spirituous liquors, under the new law of free trade in the island. The death of the heathen rival to King Radama is announced. It seems to have been very sudden. We trust no foul play has been practised towards him by the natives.

OROOMIAH TO LONDON: REMARKABLE JOURNEY OF TWO NESTORIANS.

FROM time to time we have recorded the operations of the American missionaries among the Nestorians. These Nestorians occupy the eastern side of the mountains of Kurdistan. Originally they were spread over the whole region, both on the Turkish and the Persian frontiers. Many years ago, however, by a masterly stroke of policy, the agents of Rome effected a schism, the consequence of which was that the Nestorians in Turkey sacrificed their ecclesiastical independence, and gave in their adhesion to Rome. The Nestorians under the Persian Government remained independent, and continue so to this day. They have their own organization; they have a patriarch at their head, with bishops, and priests, and deacons. They refuse to own allegiance to the Pope, and they reject all overtures on the part of his emissaries, although these emissaries are continually and actively endeavouring to make proselytes. When the American missionaries first visited Aderbeijan, as the Persians call the province where the Nestorians are found, their religious tenets and practices were but little known in Europe; but by their labours, and the records of travellers like Ainsworth and Layard, they are now much better known. The success of the American missions has been very great, and their works attest their extraordinary diligence. They found the people speaking a language descended from the ancient Syriac, but no effort appears to have been made to reduce this vernacular to writing. They therefore undertook and accomplished the task; and now the whole of the Scriptures, and many other valuable works, have been printed in that tongue. The excellent and lamented Stoddard was the compiler of the first published grammar of the modern Syriac. As for the ancient language, the Nestorians had in it the Bible, a book which they never abandoned the use of in their public services; in the same language they also had other works; but the mass of the people were very ignorant, and few, if any, besides the priests could read and write. Now it is different; schools and seminaries have been established, and appliances of all sorts have been instituted to disseminate among this long-forgotten people the knowledge of eternal things.

A great blessing has rested upon this mission, and the state of the Nestorians, intellectually and spiritually, is vastly improved. There have been several great revivals of religion; and multitudes have been savingly converted to Christ. Some, and chiefly Dr. Justin Perkins, give the most gratifying account of what has been accomplished in this interesting department.

The Nestorians alone speak a language derived directly from the language of Canaan in the times of our Lord. They have and use the oldest version of the New Testament, the venerable Syriac Peshito. They are the oldest independent national church on earth. They resemble in their peculiarities the church of the first centuries more nearly than any church out of Protestantism. They are the farthest east of the Christian churches, approaching as they do the shores of the Caspian Sea. But we cannot go into their history and peculiarities, and will only add that for fourteen centuries they have been enabled to preserve their separate and independent existence, and have been kept from many of the abominations which have crept into the Romish, Greek, Armenian, and other communities. Of late years, by God's blessing upon the missions from America, they have been renovated and elevated in a remarkable degree. And yet this small people, numbering but forty or fifty thousand, are despised and oppressed. Even at the present moment this is the case, and an appeal has been made to our Government in their behalf. Not only so; for several years past they have been reduced to unusual straits by the failure of their crops, which has almost amounted to famine. Under such circumstances, we are not surprised to read the following in the "Monthly Notices of the American Missions in Western Asia" for August: "Mr. Cobb refers to the causes of disturbance alluded to in former letters—oppression, poverty, &c.—as still exerting a most unfortunate and distracting influence upon the minds of the Nestorian people, leading not only to the talk of a general emigration to Russia, but to many other schemes for finding relief. To this, in great measure, he says, is probably to be attributed the unsatisfactory state of the missionary work in the villages during the past winter, through necessary retrenchments and the giving up of schools to some extent by the mission, and the active efforts of the Lazarists, taking advantage of such opportunities to acquire an influence and excite prejudice." We are quite aware that the prospect is not wholly dark, even now, but things are in a deplorable condition, nor is there hope of permanent amendment except in the change of policy, or rather, perhaps, of administration, on the part of the Persian Government.

Such being the circumstances of the Nestorians now, and for some time past, our readers will not be wholly surprised to hear what we are about to relate. Under the pressure brought to bear upon them, some of the Nestorians have from time to time left their country. A few have, we believe, made their way to Constantinople, and one or two others have come to light in Eastern Europe. In the beginning of May, last year, an old presbyter, by name Yohanan, and a companion who has attended upon him, started upon a journey to no nearer place than London, and arrived at their destination about twelve months after they set out. They travelled through Armenia and the mountains of Caucasus, across Russia to Moscow and St. Petersburg. Thence they traversed Poland and Prussia, took the steamer to Hamburg, and reached London, without any acquaintance with any European language, without influence, without money, and utterly unknown. The extraordinary journey in question deserves to be recorded, and we shall describe it and the causes of it, as far as we have been able to ascertain them from Yohanan himself.

Yohanan is a Kashisha—i.e., elder or presbyter—and was brought to a more perfect acquaintance with the Gospel under Mr. Stoddard, of whom he speaks with great affection. He was subsequently engaged with Mr. Breath, the missionary printer, whom he assisted for a considerable time. He was also engaged in the active work of the ministry. Eventually, however, he was reduced to great straits, in common with many of his people, and he appears to have laid much to heart the severities and extortions of the Persian rulers and their agents—the lords of the Ishmaelites, as he terms them. He therefore went and asked the Bishop Yohanan, of the same name and age as himself, what he was to do. The Bishop, in concert with Deacon Isaac, brother of the young patriarch, Shimun, gave him a letter which both signed, and which bore the Bishop's seal. This letter was a simple commission or permission, written in English, to go forth and make an appeal to Christian men. Yohanan has written some account of his journey at our request; and although some portions of it are hopelessly obscure, it is in other parts intelligible enough, and its general sense is quite plain.

Yohanan says he is of the village of Shamakia, not far from Oroomiah, and near the lake of the same name. There he has left a wife and two daughters, of whom he speaks in a very affectionate and anxious manner. Bidding adieu to them, Yohanan and Yuseph girded themselves for their journey. Yohanan says: "The day we set out from Oroomiah we came to Geulan, to the house of Mar Yohanan, the Bishop. Mar Yohanan was at home. The same day there also came from the city to Geulan the father of Mar Yohanan, whom I saw. His name is Presbyter Gewergis, and he is an old man, very advanced in years. Starting from Geulan, we came to Tabreez. We staid a few days in Tabreez for a passport." From Tabreez they proceeded till they reached the banks of the Aras, which is, as he says, a great river, on the borders of Persia. After spending one night upon the banks of the Aras, they went on till they came to Nakhshivan, where they remained two days. The passport which they had obtained at Tabreez was there taken from them and examined. Leaving Nakhshivan, they made their way to a village near Erivan, in Armenia. Here, owing to the fatigues of their journey, they rested for a few days in the house of a man whose name they forget, but who was an Oroomian, and showed them much kindness. They next advanced to Erivan, and in that city they remained for two days, at no great distance from Mount Ararat. Thence they walked to Shababaran, and after stopping one night, started for Tiflis. In Tiflis they found two carpenters, natives of Oroomiah, whose names were Isaia and Yohanan, and one of them known to our travellers, who tell us that Dr. Perkins knows them. Some days were spent at Tiflis, and a little money was given them to help them on the way.

Their next march was from Tiflis, northwards, to the mountain ranges of the Caucasus, whose lofty heights are duly taken notice of; mention is also made of a river which runs through the pass, and of the snow which lay upon the mountains—as deep in one place, Yohanan says, as he was high. Leaving the mountains, they pushed on by way of Georgiewsk to Stauropol. About this time Yohanan was attacked by fever, which seems to have been violent. The Tabreez passport was again taken from them, and another given them. When Yohanan had somewhat recovered from his illness they once more proceeded on their toilsome journey, till they came to Rostow, on the river Don, and a little east of the sea of Azov. The names of many places which were passed through are not remembered, or were not ascertained, with the exception of Isum, till they reached Charkow, where they staid for a few days, but they seem to have shared the rites of hospitality in this region wherever they went. From Charkow they advanced to Kursk, and afterwards were much harassed in their progress by the abundance of rain, which was followed by snow and ice. To aggravate the difficulty, Yohanan suffered from a bad foot, which caused him intense pain, and in this wretched condition they came at length to Tula. At Tula they rested a few days, and the old man's foot became better. After leaving Tula, two places of importance were passed by the pilgrims, but the names of these places are unknown to them. The difficulties of travelling were not diminished as they advanced northwards, but they met with those who supplied them with necessaries and gave them shelter. The cold became severe, and the wind was keen and strong; indeed, the old man says that the cold seemed to enter into his soul before they came to Moscow.

Two days were passed in quiet, and then Yohanan and his companion Yuseph went in search of a pastor, to whom they gave the letter they had received from Oroomiah. He carried this document away for a time, but gave the weary wanderers a little money, bidding them go away for three days, and then return. Yohanan says: "I did not understand his speech, but he signified to me with his hand that we should return to our quarters. His house was a long way from where we were staying. The cold, moreover, was great in Moscow, and we could not go to him till after six days, and then we went to him. He gave me the letter, armed with a seal upon it, and some little written upon the letter. He gave us a little money, and a writing written with the names of men. We did not talk with him with the tongue. Taking away the writing, we afterwards went to the persons in question, who gave us money. It was cold, and I was unable to walk much. Every day, for three days, we went among them. They gave me money. Our Lord Jesus Christ deliver our soul out of affliction! There was great cold at Moscow, and I fell into an illness, and was so unwell, I thought I should not recover from this affliction. Our Lord Jesus Christ was a kind physician, and I did not leave my two daughters orphans; but I remained many days in Moscow after I recovered from the danger. I went to a pastor, who gave me about two shillings of your money. He was building a new church, the labour of which was not yet terminated, and it was a very handsome church. After this I went to the house of a certain man, who was gone to St. Petersburg, but his wife was endowed with great kindness for strangers, and she gave us a little money, saying that her husband was not at home, or he would have given us more. She added that after a few days he would return, and when he was at home he would render us assistance." Unfortunately, they were not able to go. Yohanan says they waited many days in Moscow; "know not in truth how many days we were in Moscow, but it was about fifty days I know."

Taking their leave of Moscow, where they had arrived in the middle of November, they started early in January once more towards the north, and journeyed till they arrived at Twer, where they took up their quarters for six days. Here they found out a certain pastor, or priest, who presented a trifle to them. After leaving Twer they found their way to a railway station, where they lighted upon a Lutheran, to whom they showed their letter, which now bore the official seal of the Moscow Superintendency. When he had read their letter they said, "We ask of thee that we may sit in a carriage without money." This request was complied with. Their Lutheran friend was very kind to them; he inquired of them if they were Protestants; to which they replied that they were; so he said, "Get into the train in the evening." In the evening they went, therefore, and took their places in a carriage without money, and were conveyed to St. Petersburg. Here a few days were spent, in the course of which they learned the whereabouts of a pastor, who sent them to some one by whom the money was supplied for a further excursion by railway. So they once more took their places, and eventually arrived at Königsberg. There is some confusion and obscurity as to the names in this region, but it appears that at one place—probably Wilna—they went to the house of a Jew, and thence to that of a pastor, who gave them some names of persons to be applied to, and sent a woman with them as their guide. Some little aid was obtained in this way, and then they proceeded to another place, where they again lodged with a Jew, staying six days, in hope of a vessel. The Jew told them there was a ship all ready, but there proved to be none; so they secured a place in the train and went on by rail to Königsberg.

Once more they took up their quarters with a Jew, but the language was a great obstacle, and with some difficulty they made known to their Hebrew friend their actual condition, and he sent with them one of his own nation, who knew something of a language of which Yohanan also knew something—probably Armenian. It was now April in the present year. Five weary months had been occupied in their Russian sojourn and wanderings between Moscow and the Prussian frontier, but every step brought them nearer the goal. At this point the narration of Yohanan becomes more full and intelligible, but we will only rapidly pass over it. At Königsberg a former missionary named Tartakover and others treated the strangers kindly. Tartakover had been a Jew, and he had seen the Eastern world; he knew a little Syriac, and he had a wife who could read English, who could, therefore, read the original letter from Bishop Yohanan. Tartakover and his wife behaved with great kindness; he gave the travellers a letter, and he introduced them to a friend, who was interested in them, got them to read and sing in Syriac, and obtained relief for them. The tide was evidently turning in their favour. They were within the confines of the Protestant world, and the change was remarkable. Ten days were passed at Königsberg in the house of a Jew, and two days in the house of one whose name we cannot venture to translate out of Syriac characters, and who behaved very liberally to them. When they set out, this good friend wrote a letter for them, addressed to a pastor in Berlin; he gave them money, he prayed with them before they left his house, he took them to the railway-station, he paid their hire, he embraced them affectionately when he left them, he gave the guard a note for a cabman at Berlin, and explained everything to promote their safe and comfortable arrival. On arriving at Berlin they were conducted to the house of the pastor to whom the cabman had been instructed to take them. Among other friends in this city, special mention is made of Messrs. Uhlemann, or Ullmann, and Petermann. There is something peculiarly interesting in the brief story of the visit to Berlin. Mr. Petermann was able to speak a little Turkish, and to read a little Syriac; he had seen Dr. Perkins at Mosul, and had in his house portraits of Dr. Perkins, of Yohanan the bishop, of two brothers of the patriarch.

&c. Moreover, Mr. Petermann could talk Persian, "the language of the Iahmaalites," and he informed our friends how he had travelled in Medo-Persia, had visited Mosul, and Bagdad, Shiraz, Ispahan, &c. Not only so, he had procured Syriac books printed at Oroomiah, and, at least in part, printed by our own Yohanan himself. Kind friends at Berlin came forward with the necessary funds, and the Nestorians were eventually sent by rail to Hamburg, where they remained for a few days waiting for an opportunity to cross over to England. The steamer brought them to London, which they reached early in the month of May. Yohanan says they met with some man who took them to the Strangers' Home for Asiatics, in Limehouse; and he concludes by saying, "May our Lord Jesus Christ reward the love of all true Christians in London! End of the travels of Presbyter Yohanan, a son of Oroomiah. In the month Ab, on the 7th, the third day in the week, in the year of Christ 1862."

It was ascertained at the Strangers' Home that Yohanan read the ancient Syriac, and the writer of this notice, who had studied the language, was induced to attempt to communicate with them through that medium. The experiment was successful, and all that it was needful to ascertain was soon ascertained. The case was made public, and as the men were truthful and religious, intelligent, and representatives of a noble race, they have found favour among us. Yohanan has pleaded not only his own cause, but that of his people, and he urges with great earnestness that all the influence we can bring to bear upon the Persian Government should be brought to bear, that the cruel extortion and heartless oppression under which the Nestorians groan may cease. The departure of these interesting strangers will, we understand, take place about the 10th of September.

THE LATE BISHOP BOWEN.*

THE West African Mission rapidly recruits the Church above from the ranks of the Church below. That soil is sadly glorious with many a true martyr's grave. And whatever be the additional causes of peril, it would seem as if the labours of eminent station increased the average fatality. European bishops appear to just touch the soil and inaugurate their work, and die. In the words of the volume before us, that Church there is "incessantly arrayed in the mourning attire of orphanage; as one by one, its chief pastors have been removed, after just sufficient stay to leave behind them no faint remembrance of their love for Christ and His body."

Whether these repeated bereavements do not indicate some needful change of management, might well be questioned, as it has been questioned. Valuable lives ought not to be rashly sacrificed either by the vicarious zeal of those who would generously promote the glorious martyrdom of others, or by the possibly mistaken feeling of duty which impels more purely ardent spirits to the encounter of their own. The ways of Providence are, no doubt, mysterious; and it becomes us to be very diffident in our judgments and utterances in these respects. But it is not easy to read the pathetic narrative of the death of Bishop Bowen, after that of his recently-married wife and her still-born babe, without some misgivings as to the real cause and the undemonstrated necessity for the sacrifice. Nothing indeed can be nobler than Bowen's own motives in accepting the post offered him; but the question still remains as to their soundness. An English bishopric he might (he tells us) have felt free to refuse; but the Bishopric of Sierra Leone he did not feel free to refuse. Why? Because it was a post of danger; and as a soldier of Christ, he ought not to flinch! We cannot admit the cogency of this logic; and we fear there is a lurking something in the process which will not bear rigid examination. If every offer by man of a sphere of ecclesiastical labour be a call of God in Providence, which it is imperative to accept, a bishopric in England must stand on the same footing in that respect as a bishopric in Africa. And if peril or hardship be an ingredient which gives an additional power to the call, there are responsibilities incident to every important station of a sufficiently serious character, though they may differ in degree or kind from the perils of an African climate. It is not to be doubted but that men of thorough piety, courage, faith, and good sense might feel themselves perfectly justified in refusing such a post when offered them, without any impeachment before God or man of their entire readiness to act or suffer as good soldiers of Christ Jesus. And there is often more real moral courage and sanctified wisdom needed for declining than for accepting an offer of the kind. Even a suspicion of our own corrupt selfishness, and of our tendency to indolence, or to a shrinking from labour or peril, may assume a somewhat morbid character, and act as an irregular propeller, in opposition to healthy and lawful natural feelings, and in derogation of the dictates of a sounder judgment. How far such observations might apply to the case before us is a matter now of comparative unimportance. Personal faith, conviction, and sense of duty, must determine the action of each individual; and it is impossible to lay down maxims of an abstract kind applicable to all cases. The ways of God, too, are inscrutable; and even the death of a man like Bishop Bowen, in the work in which he was engaged, may have more important effects than his living activity in Syria would have had; though we are of opinion that his antecedents did indicate his superior fitness for the latter-named sphere, and though we incline to regard his going to Africa as a pity and a mistake.

Making needful abatement for the partiality of sisterly affection, the "Memorials" of John Bowen compose a fair picture of the man; and constitute a volume which cannot be read without deep interest and real edification. We knew Bowen when he was in Trinity College, Dublin, and met him in after years in Turkey; and to the simplicity, goodness, and manliness of his genuine and attractive character, could add the testimony of personal observation. It is going a little too far, we think, however, to designate him a "great man," in the proper or even the ordinary use of that term. Nor would any one have been so ready as himself to disallow the colouring of some of the partial picturings of acquaintances or friends which are (naturally enough) inserted in this volume. We remember well a conversation with himself at Scutari, in Turkey, in which he spoke strongly of the little reliance to be placed on the descriptions, of character or of facts, which are sent from foreign scenes to England, and printed and devoured there. Not that the misdescription or exaggeration is intentional, but that in the absence of objects of comparison, and in the general dearth and desolation, the day of small things, instead of being despised, assumes unreasonable proportions.

John Bowen was a Welshman, born in November, 1815. His mother had desired to dedicate her firstborn son to the Lord; and her first prayer on receiving the infant in her arms was that he might be an earnest and useful minister in the Church. For years this prayer seemed to be disregarded, but it was answered in the end. When about twenty years of age he became a settler in Canada; and during this part of his life he became acquainted with the Rev. C. B. Gribble, whose friendship continued to the close of his life, and whose contributions to this narrative are deeply interesting. The conversion of Bowen is dated by himself in March, 1842, when he was about twenty-seven years of age. Some descriptions of his mental processes and experiences are given, upon which we do not care to pronounce any particular opinion. To separate imagination from fact, and to distinguish between the workings of the Divine spirit in man and those of our nature itself, is a delicate or impossible task. Shakespeare conveyed more than perhaps even he intended when he wrote, "There are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in your philosophy." And in the turning of a human soul from darkness to light there are often incidental operations or emotions, if not something more, too, than these, which cannot be reduced to philosophical categories. Nevertheless, it will always be a matter of deep and serious and reasonable interest and investigation to store up all such facts, and trace all such operations and experiences, so far as we can, to their true sources. We think we can detect in some of his statements the sinister effects of an exaggerated school of theology, as well as, perhaps, a certain constitutional morbid tendency, in keeping him from the full power, liberty, and joy of the Gospel of Grace. However, we doubt not but that most readers will enjoy the perusal of this part of his life particularly. After some consideration and struggle he renounced his Canadian life, and, resolving to enter the ministry, returned home, and went to Trinity College, Dublin, as a student. He was ordained at Ripon as deacon by Bishop Longley, in September, 1846, and licensed to the curacy of Knaresborough, in Yorkshire. At this period an uncle, dying, left him in possession of a moderate estate; and shortly afterwards, his mother also dying, his ties to home seemed loosened. After two years spent in his curacy, he undertook his first journey to Syria and the East, as an amateur visitor (or "envoy," as his biographer calls him), in some sort of connexion with the Church Missionary Society. His travels, journals, and letters, in this part of the work, and in a subsequent chapter, which describes him as more directly a "missionary" to the same regions, cannot fail to be productive of interest, and are filled with valuable information of a very pleasing character. Returning to England in the winter of 1851 (after some desultory occupation), he was appointed to the Rectory of Orton Longueville in the autumn of 1852, where he had spent two years, when, on the request of the Protestants of Nablous, who appealed to the Bishop of Jerusalem, he went out temporarily as a "missionary" to them, in October, 1854. There he seems to have remained over a year, and was superseded by a regular missionary, appointed by the Church Missionary Society. In the spring of 1856 he went to Constantinople, visited the Crimea and the camp before Sebastopol, and returned to his parish of Orton Longueville in the summer of that year. In the month of June, 1857, the Bishopric of Sierra Leone was offered to him, and after some consideration accepted by him. During the interval between his consecration and his departure he became acquainted with the lady whom he soon married, and they departed together for the fatal shores of Africa in November, 1857. In the beginning of August, 1858, his beloved wife was taken from him, after giving birth to a still-born babe. On the day she was buried he writes: "The light of my eyes is taken! they have laid her in the grave to-day. Oh, God, Thou hast wounded me very sore! Help me to profit by the rod—to learn the lesson. May it redound to good!"

Within less than a year from this date (an interval occupied in labours, travels, and sickness), the Bishop himself was removed to rejoin his partner in a brighter world. He died of fever, on the 28th May, 1859, being thus about forty-four years of age, or little more than in his prime.

His biographer has divided his life into eight sections—"the schoolboy—the settler—the student—the curate—the envoy—the rector—the missionary—the bishop." Two or three of these might well have been spared and condensed into the others. The whole presents to us a man of average intellectual powers and acquirements, and of far more than average virtues, energies and attractions; somewhat morbidly sensitive, rather restless and unsettled, but from the time of his acquaintance with the power and sweetness of salvation, devoted to the service of his God and Saviour. The volume is far more interesting than a romance, being true; and full also of variety, incident, and pictures of real humanity of a delightful kind. The whole of his career, and especially the painfully-pathetic close of it, is of such a character as to indispose us to any adverse criticism upon the naturally partial views of his biographer. Readers will reflect and judge for themselves. But with whatever rebate of allowance, none can deny that John Bowen was an eminently good man, as well as a devoted soldier of the cross.

THE CONQUEST AND THE REWARD.—In primitive times, when travelling was rendered difficult, from want of places of public entertainment, hospitality was exercised by private individuals to a very great extent—of which, indeed, we find frequent traces in all history, and in none more than the Old Testament. Persons who partook of this hospitality, and those who practised it, frequently contracted habits of friendship and regard for each other; and it became a well-established custom, among the Greeks and Romans, to provide their guest with some particular mark, which was handed down from father to son, and insured hospitality and kind treatment whenever it was presented. This mark was usually a small stone, or pebble, cut in half, and upon the halves of which the host and guest mutually inscribed their names, and then interchanged them with each other. The production of this lessera was quite enough to insure friendship for themselves or descendants whenever they travelled again in the same direction, while it is evident that these stones required to be privately kept, and the names written on them carefully concealed, lest others should obtain the privileges instead of the persons for whom they were intended. How natural, then, the allusion to this custom in the words (Rev. ii. 17), "I will give him that overcometh to eat of the hidden manna!" and, having done, having made himself partaker of my hospitality, having recognised him as my guest, my friend, "I will present him with the white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth, saving he who receiveth it." I will give him a pledge of my friendship, sacred and inviolable, known only to himself.—Rev. H. Blunt.

Biography.

THE LATE MAJOR-GENERAL BECKWITH.

THE Waldensian Church is mourning throughout all her borders. A great lamentation is heard in every house and hamlet. The wise counsellor and benefactor of this Alpine race is dead, and his bones have been laid to rest in the Valleys he loved so well. "The brave Colonel," as General Beckwith was affectionately called, has finished a noble Christian work of thirty-five years' duration, and gone home to his reward, amid the sympathy and sorrow of an entire population. If the page of history nowhere shows such a series of remarkable providences as among the persecuted Vaudois, certainly the heart of man nowhere exhibits such implicit trust in God, who has been their unfailing Help and Deliverer, or such warm affection towards the agents of His love, the instrument of His signal favours. In the hour of this Church's greatest need the Lord has, time after time, raised up powerful friends to ward off the fiery trial from without, or to foster the courage and discipline the resources to bear it. The subject of the present sketch has filled up a large measure of usefulness, for it is chiefly to the blessing of God which has followed his unostentatious, but devoted and sagacious labours, that the Waldenses have been prepared for the work of evangelization throughout Italy.

The late General Beckwith was born in England, on the 2nd of October, 1787. Entering the army in early youth, he rose to the highest distinction, through personal bravery and good character. Under the orders of the Duke of Wellington he served his country during the whole Peninsular War, without receiving a single wound. It was on the field of Waterloo, towards the very close of the great battle, that a stray ball hit him above the right knee, and rendered the amputation of the leg necessary. Disabled thereby for military service, the General, then a lieutenant-colonel, retired from the army on a handsome pension. While an invalid in Brussels the great and saving change took place in his soul, through the earnest perusal of the Bible. The flame of devotion, ardent and practical, was then kindled which was to burn so steadily in this valiant soldier of the cross of Christ.

For the purposes of study he took up his abode, shortly after the proclamation of peace, in one of the English universities, and we have reason to believe that there the Word of God became the "man of his counsel," and his chief meditation. A trip in the United States, where his brother had settled, re-established his health. His active mind was casting about for some field of usefulness, when, by a strange coincidence, in which the finger of God is manifest, he was brought into a benevolent relationship with the Waldenses, which was only to close in death. The introduction happened on this wise: One day the Colonel made a call, at Apsley-house, upon his former general, the Duke of Wellington, then at the head of the Government. While waiting for an audience, he examined the library which adorned the walls of the antechamber. His eye was arrested by the first volume of the late Dr. Gilly on the Waldensian Valleys, which had lately appeared, and excited a deep interest in the distresses of this ancient and well-nigh forgotten people. The Colonel, having purchased and read the work, had his sympathies so strongly enlisted, that he resolved personally to visit the Valleys as soon as an opportunity occurred. The occasion shortly presented itself in connexion with a tour in Italy, in the year 1827. The day after his arrival at Turin he heard a Vaudois pastor preach in the Prussian Embassy. Finding that the object he had at heart could be overtaken in the few days then at disposal, he proceeded to La Tour, and lodged under the hospitable roof of the Rev. Mr. Bert. In a few hours he had put his hand—all unconsciously, no doubt—to a work which afterwards grew into a noble a memorial of Christian intelligence and generosity as can anywhere exist. The pastor and his elders were, that very week, visiting the parish to inaugurate the ten or twelve écoles du quartier, or elementary schools, for the approaching winter. Colonel Beckwith joined the party on their first excursion, and was greatly surprised to find that an old ruin, open to wind and rain, was to do duty as a school-house, especially during the most inclement season of the year, when the snow lies several feet deep on the ground. "How can twenty or thirty children be educated in such a roofless shed?" was the natural exclamation. "There is no better to be had, and the system has been carried on thus for more than a century!" was the only reply. "How much would it cost to put this building in repair and make it comfortable for teacher and taught?" he asked. The proper parties were consulted, and the calculation of 14*l.* was arrived at. "Then let the repairs be begun immediately," said the Colonel, with the soldierlike decision which characterised all his actions, "and I will pay the money."

Thus was the germ planted of a great movement which engrossed the enthusiasm of the Colonel's head and heart in after years, and carried along with it the development of the latent energies of a dispirited, because oppressed people. This first school-house became the model of all the others. It was a happy thought, from which the moral and intellectual advance of the Waldenses may be dated. Like the stone once set in motion, the movement rolled onwards with increasing force, till the Valleys were studded with a host of educational appliances worthy of the progress and requirements of the age. The rivalry of the various parishes was excited, and the Colonel knew well, as we shall see, how to turn the excitement into a healthy channel of aid-receiving effort.

But the Colonel was not yet aware how true, how free from exaggeration—nay, how far short of the reality—were the harrowing details of Dr. Gilly as to the destitution, in every sense, of the Valleys. Not until the two following summers, when he returned from his visit to Rome, to spend four months each time rambling over hill and dale, examining with a keen eye every circumstance, and obtaining from the pastors the necessary information, did he form his plans, and set himself systematically to ameliorate the sad condition of the sturdy mountaineers, especially in the educational department, where, with such pleasure to himself, and benefit to the neighbourhood, he had already broken ground. He began with the humble primary schools, then numbering 127, now increased to 144. These, in most cases, were held in the stables of the various hamlets, the richest proprietor of the district giving shelter to the school under the same roof with the oxen, as his contribution to the cause. The marvel is that in such circumstances education, in any shape or form—good, bad, or indifferent—should have been continued. But the same surprise is excited in all that belongs to the Waldensians, whose very existence is the greatest marvel, after the cruelties which for ages have been relentlessly practised upon them. The Colonel set about the construction of suitable houses—a few here and a few there, at first—until, in 1830, he had overtaken the most remote points in the glens, and the most rugged slopes on the hills, in each case choosing for himself the loveliest spot he could find. But though he occupied his whole time with the minutest details, and freely gave of his ample fortune, he did not pay the entire cost of these buildings. The inhabitants of the place were held bound to furnish the site and the materials as the condition on which the other expenses would be defrayed. He cordially consulted the pastors and consistories as to all his plans. Occasionally dissatisfaction was expressed, but the Colonel soon converted opposition into co-operation, by threatening to transfer his offer, unless at once accepted, to other districts equally necessitous.

No sooner were the primary schools in good working operation, and a rudimentary education provided for every Waldensian child, than the Colonel, in 1831, turned with equal zeal and perseverance to the reconstruction of the parish or communal schools, in which an average of 100 children, gathered from the surrounding district, received a higher instruction. These were in every respect in a most deplorable condition, according to the testimony of those well able to give an opinion. Either the buildings were wanting, or were wholly insufficient for the purpose. In no parish was there accommodation for the hard-working and underpaid teacher. It would have been useless to ask the poverty-stricken people to build commodious and substantial structures at their own expense; and to have erected them with extraneous help, without sacrifice or effort on their part, would have been demoralising in its effects on character. The Colonel avoided both extremes. Addressing himself to the Communal Councils, he said, "Contribute your 200*l.*, and I will supply you with a suitable school-house." And the 200*l.* was given, and the school was built, at an expense of 400*l.* to 500*l.*, the deficit being paid by the Colonel himself, who, having no friends dependent on his bounty, and not having married till late in life a Waldensian lady, was able to devote the greater part of his income to such well-devised schemes of usefulness. Helping in this way those who were willing to help themselves, he not only convinced them of the educational wants of the fifteen parish schools, but at the same time created the means of supply. "If the Waldenses," he used often to say, in after years, "had only known, when I first came among them, the amount of money I should lead them to spend, they would have driven me out of their Valleys amid a shower of stones."

When town, and village, and mountain seclusion had been provided with plain, but solid edifices, the Colonel insisted that it was necessary—in order to establish the system of training the young on a satisfactory basis—to improve the external condition of the teachers, who, for example, in the écoles du quartier, only received, through the Walloon Committee, in Holland, a small pittance of 15*f.* to 25*f.* a winter, in addition to a scanty supply of daily food provided, in turn, by the parents of the pupils. The steps taken with this object in view were completely successful, through the independent action of the various communities.

"And now," said Colonel Beckwith—who, though he so often asserted that he had been sent to preach the Gospel with brick and mortar, was ambitious of great moral results through these processes of stone and lime—"now that you have excellent houses for schools and good salaries for the teachers, we must see to it that the masters are what they ought to be, well-instructed themselves, and efficient in teaching others. Acting on this principle, he selected forthwith several of the ablest parish teachers, and at his own expense sent them, one after another, to Lausanne, where Mr. Gauthey, now of Paris, then conducted a first-class normal school; and shortly after, at the instigation of the Colonel, a law was passed by the Synod to the effect that no one should be allowed to occupy the position of teacher in the Waldensian Church who did not hold a patent—that is, a document certifying that he possessed the requisite information and ability. In this slow and sagacious way the whole system of education in the inferior schools was re-modelled.

But the anxieties of the Colonel took a much wider range. Dr. Gilly had by this time established a Waldensian Committee in London, of which the Earl of Harrowby and Mr. Bracebridge were active members, and raised funds for the erection of a college in the Valleys, towards which one benevolent lady had given 5,000*l.* Till this time the students of divinity had repaired to various places across the Alps for instruction, and the Waldensian Valleys were disturbed by the conflicting theological views of Geneva, Strasburg, and Berlin. At first, it was proposed that the scientific and classical branches should alone be taught at the college, and that candidates for the ministry, according to the tutorial system, should reside with the leading pastors of the Church for three or four years, and carry on their studies under their guidance. So earnestly was this plan recommended, that a premium was offered to the pastor who should first train a young man for the Church, as well as a prize to the first ordained pastor who had been educated in this way. But the scheme was overruled by the Synod through the appointment of a staff of theological professors, who have since been transferred to Tuscany, while the literary students and professors remain at La Tour. The Colonel entered heartily into the college scheme, and having taken up his abode in the Valleys, and gained the confidence both of the Waldenses and Dr. Gilly, was able to direct the operations, and deservedly to claim that he had taken a leading part in the erection and foundation of the institute.

A similar establishment for the superior training of young women was then begun by the Colonel, and this successful "Pensionnat" was wholly indebted to him for its support during several years, as well as for all the details of its foundation, which he personally arranged.

At a later period, in concert with Dr. Gilly, he gave further stability to the college by building six houses for the professors, at an expense of 3,500*l.*, and in the erection of the handsome parish church and parsonage of La Tour, the cost of which, 3,640*l.*, was defrayed by contributions sent from England. It was in one of the professor's houses that the good old man, the Father of the Vaudois, as he was lovingly called, lived and died. At last the hour of emancipation arrived, and the shackles of the Waldenses were broken, we trust, for ever. The Colonel had foreseen the crisis, and laboured against its coming. Frequently he assured his friends, lest they should be puffed up with the beauty and perfection of their scholastic and ecclesiastical equipments, that while he had expended all his efforts on the Valleys, as the only field then open for practical exertion, it was not for the Waldenses, either alone or principally, but for wide Italy, through them, at some future time. At once he sent away to Tuscany, at his own expense, five or six professors, to perfect themselves in the Italian Athens, in the flowing idioms of Dante and Petrarch. On their return they shared their attainments with the teachers, and Italian classes were immediately commenced in the parish schools.

In 1851 Colonel Beckwith established himself at Turin, in order to encourage the evangelist labouring in the capital, and to lay the foundations of the handsome church, for which he provided the funds; superintending also the erection of the building with an energy which never relaxed for a moment.

After the death of his friend and fellow-labourer, Dr. Gilly, in 1855, Colonel Beckwith (who, about the year 1847, had attained the rank of Major-General, though the endeared name of Colonel ever remained on the lips of the Waldenses) was prostrated by a severe malady, on recovering from which he went to Paris, then for a year or two to Calais, and finally, in 1861, returned to La Tour, to spend his declining strength amid the scenes of his manly activity for the advancement of the kingdom of Christ. He had for some time back considered his latter end at hand; and when death came, he was calm and happy in the assurance of peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

The reader must have already formed an idea of the General's character from the foregoing details of his leading plan for the regeneration of the primitive Christians of Piedmont. But it is impossible to estimate aright the lion-hearted perseverance of the man without an intimate acquaintance with the sad plight in which he found the Waldenses in 1827, and the numerous discouragements thrown in his way in raising them to the level of the most favoured communities. The rare qualities of decision and prudence were admirably blended in him. No obstacle could stand before the former, while a constant exercise of the latter alone avoided possible complications with a bigoted Government, which prohibited alike the use of the Italian tongue and the Lancasterian system of education in the Valleys. His noble deeds have excited the admiration and gratitude of the world. The Agrarian Congress of Piedmont, in 1847, after visiting the college and schools of La Tour, not only thought it an act of justice to give a diploma to the professors, expressing their highest satisfaction, but also drew up an address, full of well-merited praises, to General Beckwith, as the promoter of so many notable improvements. In December, 1848, King Charles Albert conferred upon him the Grand Cross of St. Maurice, in testimony of his royal gratitude for the many benefits he had conferred on his loyal subjects, the Waldenses, during a twenty years' sojourn among them, while all the Italian newspapers have, since his death, contributed their meed of earnest praise in sorrowful obituary notices. And how can we describe the love borne to the General by the people among whom he lived and laboured, denying himself, for their sakes, the pleasures of kindred and country, upon whom his piety exercised such a powerful moral influence, as they saw his reverence for the Bible, his regularity in church, his morning and evening family-worship, his entire consecration of head and heart and fortune to benefit those who had suffered the loss of all things for Christ? They alone know how accessible he was at all times, freely counselling them as to the disposition of their land, the repair of their roads, the entire management of their worldly concerns. They alone know how kindly he received them all to his house, which was thrown open every evening for the discussion of all the subjects that related to their temporal and spiritual interests. They alone know how wisely he taught them to exert their little strength, and how humbly he refused every entreaty to speak of the large benevolence on his part, which crowned their efforts with success. They alone know his untiring energy and the unnumbered schemes for their good with which he occupied his daily thoughts—among others, the translation of the New Testament and Catechisms into the Waldensian patois, the rearing of a race of educated Christian mothers, and caring for the ragged and orphan children. No man, while living, was so much esteemed; and now that he is dead, his memory will remain graven on their hearts. Almost the only ornament seen in their cottages is a portrait of the General, represented as they so often saw him—with his wooden leg, his gun on his shoulder, and his dog by his side. On one of the school-houses, in the parish of St. Jean, is an inscription to this effect: "Whosoever passes this way, let him bless the name of Colonel Beckwith." No monument of stone or brass is needed while his works remain to speak to the eye of future generations, and the remembrance of his devotion and charity is spoken from grateful sire to son. But we are glad to know that a biography of the General is to be shortly drawn up by one who knew him well, and can obtain access to other sources of information, which he will embody wisely and well in a fitting souvenir.

It should not be overlooked that while the General was a staunch and zealous Episcopalian, this did not hinder him from powerfully aiding a Church whose polity more nearly resembles the Presbyterian system. Such an example of Christian charity is most refreshing, and should not be lost upon the friends of missionary enterprise. The fact is, that the General regarded the Waldenses as the remains of the ancient Italian Church, whose succession, at least as to doctrine, was truly Apostolic. Besides, his Christianity was so enlightened and profound as to overlook all outward forms, and join heart and hand with all who wish, above everything, to preach Jesus Christ and Him crucified. He regarded the Israel of the Alps not as Presbyterians, but as witnesses of the saving truth of the Gospel, which they were again destined to carry over the length and breadth of their native land, as men who desired no other warrant for their teaching but the Bible, to which he himself had so reverently submitted. More than once he said that, so far as he was concerned, the whole controversy with Rome was confined to these two points, the blood of Christ as the victim of propitiation for our sins, and the authority of the Bible as alone the rule of faith and manners—truths in regard to which the Waldenses have always held the same language and followed the same rule of conduct. And if an apparent coldness for a time ensued between the benefactor and his grateful children, because they kindly but firmly refused in any way to alter their ancient liturgy, so as to accommodate it to prelatical views and forms of worship, it is gratifying to know that it passed away like a cloud, and sunshine was restored—that he acquiesced in the independence of the Church, and regarded the Waldenses as all the more worthy of confidence and support in carrying the Gospel to their brethren in Central and Southern Italy, because neither kindness nor malice would ever induce them to abate one jot or tittle of what they regarded as scriptural truth.

Well may we ask, Who is to take the place of the staunch friend of this interesting race? It has been betimes not a little fashionable to decry their weakness, and ridicule their puny efforts, for the purpose of passing them by with the much-needed sympathy of the benevolent foreigner. Such was not the spirit of General Beckwith. Their poverty and degradation were his very arguments for coming earnestly to their aid. Their great weakness, generated by suffering in the noblest cause, formed his very motive for lending an arm of strength to their operations. And even now in much feebleness they appeal for substantial support in the great struggle for which they have girded themselves. May the Lord fight for them as heretofore, and raise them up men of indomitable faith and valour, to succour and cheer their efforts, to actively preach that Gospel for which they have borne through ages such a faithful testimony!

GREAT ABUNDANCE OF EPISCOPAL LETTERS.

Since the grand fête of the canonisation of the Japanese martyrs at Rome, our Romanist bishops have published innumerable letters. Some of these, in prolix style, explain the motives which prevented them from taking part in that pompous gathering. Others narrate, in an emphatic manner, the marvels which they witnessed in the Eternal City. I will not analyse the contents of these ecclesiastical effusions; that would be an undertaking too wearisome for your readers. But it will be well to make some general reflections upon this subject.

1. In the first place, it is clear that Rome has given the word of command to the bishops, and in particular to the French prelates, to keep up a constant agitation amongst the masses of the people. This is the cause of the prodigious abundance of clerical publications above mentioned. Our Romanist bishops have nothing new to say; they copy one another with a tiresome monotony. It is always the same description of the splendid fêtes celebrated in the city of the Vatican. But each episcopal letter, being read by the parish priests in all the churches of the diocese, is a means of reanimating or strengthening the zeal of the devotees for the temporal power of the Pope, and of inflaming the passions of the multitude. This is a scheme of the bishops; they hope that Napoleon III. and his counsellors will be deterred from giving satisfaction to the Italians by the fear of irritating their own people. Hitherto the thing has well succeeded; but will it for any long time be equally successful? I do not believe it.

2. As to the arguments adduced in these episcopal letters, it would be difficult to imagine anything more weak and puerile. The reverend personages who write such epistles suppose, apparently, that good sense, logic, and the reasonable examination of facts, are not at all necessary for the triumph of their cause. Thus, for example, they make no reply to those who appeal to the important principle that the Romans, like other peoples, ought to exercise the right of choosing that government which suits them best. They no longer attempt to refute the grave accusations preferred by the civilised world against the Government of the Cardinals. They content themselves with affirming that the fall of the temporal power of the Pope would involve the universal ruin of human societies; and after having heaped gross invectives upon all their adversaries, they labour to excite the imagination of the people by a poetical description of the pontifical ceremonies. Certainly, the bishops would do better to be less of rhetoricians and more of logicians.

3. That which is the most striking feature of the Episcopal letters is their papaltry, if I may use the expression. Never have the Roman clergy so servilely prostrated themselves before the pontifical throne; never have they represented the Papacy under forms more nearly resembling deification. Pius IX. is everywhere compared to Jesus Christ, and placed upon the same level. His pretended sufferings are shamelessly compared to the passion of the God-man in the Garden of Gethsemane, and to the tortures of Calvary! Pius IX. wears a crown of thorns like his Master! He also is crucified (in effigy, or metaphorically, you will understand), according to the example of the Saviour! In one word, the poor weak old man, Pio Nono, presents in his whole person and life the perfect image of Christ! When this Pontiff, by the hand of his secretary, addresses a few lines of reply to a bishop, this insipid and insignificant epistle, in bad Latin, is boldly put beside the Epistles of St. Paul, and the prelate declares [this is literal] that it ought to find a place in the Bible with the letters sent to Timothy and Titus!! In truth, this papaltry is disgusting. How is it these bishops do not fear to shock the understanding and the conscience of the Roman Catholics themselves—at least, of the more enlightened—by these sacrilegious similitudes? Is it not enough to adore the Virgin Mary as a fourth person of the Divinity? Will they descend still lower, if it be possible, in adoring the Pope like a god upon the earth? For the rest, this papaltry is a proof, not of strength, but of weakness. Were the prelates better assured of being supported by public opinion, they would not have recourse to this unworthy apotheosis of the Papacy. But seeing that the earth threatens to open beneath their feet, they labour to identify the existence of the pontifical power with that of God Himself. This is a desperate extremity, which will turn to the confusion of the Romanist clergy.

JUDICIAL DECISION RESPECTING THE MARRIAGE OF PRIESTS.

I have already had occasion to speak of the question of the marriage of priests, or rather of ex-priests. The substance of the question, in few words, is this: A man has received holy orders from the hand of a Roman bishop, and has promised to live in perpetual celibacy. But after trying this life for some time, the priest discovers that this engagement on his part was a rash one. He then resolves to renounce the ecclesiastical functions; he abdicates the sacerdotal character; and, having once more become a simple citizen, he presents himself before the municipal magistrate on whom, by the French law, the duty of sanctioning civil marriages devolves. Now can that magistrate refuse to fulfil the office by saying, "You are still a priest in the eye of the law, and priests have not the right to marry?"

It would seem that this question can hardly be a matter for serious doubt. Thus, in England, in Holland, in Prussia, in America—in all the Protestant countries—a Romish priest is always free to contract a regular marriage, conformed to the established legislation. Neither the Governments nor the judicial tribunals interfere in the matter. That the married priest should be excommunicated, and deprived, d divinis, by his bishop, is just; he has violated his vow of celibacy, and he ceases, ipso facto, to be a priest—well; but this is a matter of internal discipline; the civil power has nothing here to decide, nothing of which to take cognizance. In France, unhappily, the question is not yet decided. Some priests, or ex-priests, have succeeded in marrying, and when their union has been celebrated according to the legal forms, no tribunal would dare to annul it. But these are exceptions; and, generally, the civil magistracy, in subjection to clerical influence, opposes marriages of this description.

M. Brou de Laurière, ex-priest in the diocese of Périgueux, department of Dordogne, presented himself before the mayors of the two communes with Mademoiselle Fressanges, demanding to contract civil marriage. But the municipal officers refused to comply with his demand. M. Brou de Laurière then brought the matter before the tribunal of Périgueux. The proceedings have continued for several months. At the outset, the four judges who compose this tribunal were equally divided, two declaring for the request of the ex-priest, and two against it. They added a fifth judge to their number, and after solemn pleadings, the majority pronounced a sentence by which M. Brou de Laurière is authorised to marry. The grounds on which this judgment is founded are the following: 1st. Marriage, according to the Code Napoleon, is a purely civil act. 2nd. All citizens have the right to marry, except in those cases which the law formally prohibits. 3rd. No prohibition of this kind is contained in the code in reference to those who have entered holy orders. 4th. The Organic Law of Worship is equally mute on this point. 5th. It belongs not to the magistrates to make up for the silence of the Legislature, &c. Consequently, the court directs the municipal officers to proceed to the celebration of the marriage of M. Brou de Laurière with Mademoiselle Fressanges.

This judgment has produced a great and universal sensation. The Paris journals have made it the subject of long discussions, and all the organs of liberal ideas have applauded a decision so conformable to the principles of religious liberty. But the affair is not ended. The Procureur-Imperial, probably in compliance with instructions from the Minister of Justice, has appealed to a superior court. The bishops and the French cardinals will use their high influence to obtain a judgment contrary to that of Périgueux. One of their principal arguments is, that auricular confession would become impossible if ex-priests might marry; for, say they, no mother of a family would consent to send a young girl to the confessional if the ecclesiastic could seduce her by the prospect of a marriage. This is a sophism, inasmuch as confession continues to exist amongst the Romanists of England, although ex-priests there are free to marry. Moreover, the State is not called upon to uphold by the force of law the particular dogmas of a Church. We must await the end of this conflict. I much fear lest the judgment of Périgueux should be annulled by the superior court.

LETTER OF M. RENAN TO THE PROFESSORS OF THE COLLEGE OF FRANCE.

You are acquainted with the name and the opinions of M. Ernest Renan. I related, some months since, how his teaching in the Hebrew, Chaldaic, and Syriac languages had been suspended after his first lecture in the College of France. M. Renan holds the same views as the famous Dr. Strauss, who wrote the "Life of Jesus." He regards the Bible as a book simply human, and puts it in the same category as the Vedas or the Koran. He sees in Jesus an incomparable man (I quote his words)—the greatest of men—because He has caused the religious sentiment to make a progress to which no other can be compared. Nevertheless, Jesus is, to M. Renan, a human being, not a Divine being. In short, he rejects, without exception, every supernatural element, whether in Judaism or in Christianity.

It was, I think, a fault on the part of the Government to give to M. Renan the office of Professor of Hebrew in the College of France; for it was easy to foresee that this infidel writer would bring his negations into the chair which was entrusted to him. In fact, his opening lecture, which took place in the month of February last, was very stormy. Thousands of auditors filled the great hall of the college; he was greeted with vehement acclamations by some, and hissed by others. The Minister of Public Instruction then suspended the course of the celebrated professor.

M. Renan has just published an apologetic letter, which is addressed to his "learned colleagues, the professors of the College of France." He feels compelled to reply to the different objections which have been made against him. This pamphlet is written with great ability; the author preserves throughout it a serious and moderate tone; but the reasons he alleges in his own favour may be refuted without much trouble.

He pretends, first, that the State, being secular, ought to remain completely neutral or indifferent on all religious questions, and should consequently permit the Bible to be treated in the high scientific schools in the same manner as the sacred books of the Hindoos and the Mohammedans. Is this just? Ought the State to forget—can it forget—that the French people make a profession of Christianity? And has it a right to pay, with money from the public treasury, a man who would subvert the foundations of Christianity?

M. Renan then maintains that he has not attacked directly any doctrine of the Gospel—"I have dealt with science," says he, "and not with controversy." This is possible. But is such a distinction real? What! a professor clearly asserts that the Bible has no characteristics of superhuman inspiration; he denies the divinity of Christ; he rejects even the idea of a revelation, with all the miracles which have accompanied it; and then considers he is unassailable in coolly saying, "It is a matter of science! I do not attack directly any doctrine or any particular communion!" Such an argument—a complete sophism—a mere mockery.

M. Renan lastly advocates this thesis: That the supernatural element is not necessary to religion. "God does not reveal Himself by miracle," says he; "He reveals Himself to the heart, in which 'groanings that cannot be uttered,' as St. Paul says, incessantly lift up the heart towards Him. It is this consciousness of obscure relations with the Infinite, of a Divine affiliation, which, written on each man's heart in characters of iron, is the source of all goodness, the foundation of love, the consolation of life. . . . But the supernatural has disappeared from this world; it no longer obtains serious belief, except amongst the classes who are not on the level of the age. Must religion, then, fall by the same stroke? No, no; religion is eternal. . . . It is eternal, like poetry, like love—man will never content himself with a finite destiny," &c. What vagueness, what uncertainty in this so-called religion of M. Renan! It is hardly a system of philosophy; for it dares not to affirm the existence of a personal God, nor the conscious immortality of the soul. It pretends that the laws of nature are fatalistic, and that, above man, there is no free Being to whom we can assign an appreciable share in the moral or material management of the universe! What becomes, then, of religion with such a theory? It is no longer anything but an empty word; for prayer, faith, hope, have all disappeared.

Alas! this strange apology of M. Renan demonstrates one thing only—namely, that a belief in Christianity has sunk to the lowest point, and is, in fact, almost extinguished, in the upper ranks of the French population.

MELANCHOLY CONDITION OF FRENCH LITERATURE AT THE PRESENT TIME.

We may quote another proof, not less decisive, of this decline of faith amongst us; this is the character of our literature. No doubt the Protestants still publish some religious books, and, thanks be to God! the flame of evangelical piety breathes in a portion of these works. The Roman Catholics also compose writings intended to instruct and to edify souls. But these religious books have very few readers. What, then, are the literary productions which excite the general attention? I regret to avow it, these productions are dictated by an irreligious spirit. I will mention specially the romance of M. Victor Hugo, entitled "Les Misérables." Five or six editions of this work have appeared in a few weeks, and the book is in everybody's hands. Let us concede to M. Victor Hugo the prestige of that talent which explains a part of his success. Let us further acknowledge that the author has sought to plead the cause of the poor. But what, after all, is this romance of "Les Misérables?" A very bad book. M. Hugo does not understand the first elements of true Christianity. The idea of sin nowhere appears in these ten volumes. He has not the least notion of the responsibility of man before God, nor of redemption in Christ, nor of evangelical holiness. When M. Victor Hugo pronounces the word religion, he has in his mind and under his pen I know not what confused assemblage of moral and social maxims. He knows nothing of the wretchedness of human nature, and attributes to society, or to fatality, all the vices of individuals. This, however, is the most accredited teacher in our country! This is the man who is considered by thousands of Frenchmen as a species of modern Messiah! Is it not Romanism which, by its foolish superstitions, has precipitated a great part of the nation into the opposite extreme—that of infidelity?

I will also refer to another production, still more offensive, the "Memoirs of the Samson Family; or, Seven Generations of Executioners at Paris." What literature! The executioners of capital sentences narrating to the public the tortures and the palpitations of their victims! We shall have, then, the literature of the scaffold! This book will achieve brilliant success. When Materialism has possessed men's minds, they require hideous and atrocious scenes to excite emotion. Ah! when will the day come in which the holy religion of Christ shall resume, in France, the supreme dominion which is its due?

NEW DISCUSSIONS UPON THE REVISION OF THE BIBLE.

No important event has occurred in connexion with the Protestantism of our country since my last communication. There is a dispute to which I have already called the attention of your readers (p. 289), and which is carried on with much ardour. The men of the liberal or negative school demand urgently that the Committee of the Paris Bible Society shall undertake a revision of the French translation of the Scriptures, and publish this new version as speedily as possible. A grand conference of pastors, convoked some time since at Niemes, deliberated and voted in this sense, contrary to that of the resolution adopted by the Conference of Paris. Le Lien, the weekly organ of the rationalistic theology, is never weary of inserting long articles upon this question. L'Esperance, which represents the orthodox beliefs, continues, for its part, to combat this movement for revision.

The free liberal pastors say that the versions of Martin and of Osterwald are very defective—that the interests of truth and of science alike demand better translations; that it would be a superstition unworthy of the disciples of the Reformation to preserve bad French Bibles for the simple reason that they are ancient, and so forth. They propose, moreover, to adopt a version of the Scriptures published at Geneva in 1835. The orthodox party reply that this version of Geneva is unacceptable, because it contains numerous errors, in respect both of piety and grammatical meaning. They add that it is in no way the mission of the Bible societies to undertake new translations of the inspired volume. Finally, they vindicate the translations of Martin and of Osterwald from the reproaches which have been cast upon them. It is probable that this hot dispute will not in any manner affect the career of the Bible Society of Paris. It is for the liberals themselves to publish their new Bible as a private undertaking, if they think fit.

A SINGULAR ACT OF INTOLERANCE AT PARIS.

One of the recent numbers of the Archives du Christianisme relates a circumstance which shows how the intolerant prejudices of Popery against Protestantism still bear sway in France, even amongst the intelligent classes. A Protestant pastor had been recommended to a lodging in a house in Paris. The proprietor of the house is a celebrated physician. Everything had been amicably arranged on the terms proposed, when the proprietor wrote to the minister, saying that he much regretted not to be able to receive him into his house, on account of his being a Protestant pastor! The pastor replied: "It is melancholy to perceive that intolerance in France is not yet extinct. . . . This teaches me still more highly to esteem the religion of my Saviour." X. X. X.

ITALY.

Florence, August 18, 1862.

GARIBALDI IN SICILY.

Nothing can exceed the ferment into which Italy has been thrown by the movement of Garibaldi in Sicily. Demonstrations more or less successful take place in every town of the Peninsula. The watchword, "Rome or death!" is placarded on the walls, and forms the topic of all newspaper writing, telegraphic communications, public meetings, and private intercourse. Nothing else is thought of for the time being. Fear and expectancy alternately sway the mind. Before the Royal proclamation was issued, universal sympathy was with the Liberator, who had only spoken out boldly, though imprudently, the feelings of the Italian heart. Since the Government has denounced the scheme, the country has decided for order and lawful obedience to the powers that be. This has been a severe test of progress in constitutional thinking, for the Turin Ministry is deservedly little respected. Whatever issues from the present threatening position of affairs, the Ratazzi Cabinet is doomed. The present Premier is known to have got into power by coquetting with Garibaldi, whom he now repudiates. He was thought better able than Ricasoli to lead the way to Rome, and is seen to be only the French prefect in Turin. He has not scrupled to compromise the kingly authority, instead of guarding the Crown, merely because his ministry was so inefficient as not to notice long ago the enrolment of volunteers, or so weak as to be unable to bring about the disbanding of their numbers by the strong arm of the law. The painful fact is that Garibaldi has not obeyed the harsh mandate of Victor Emmanuel, and now the hero King and the hero warrior are at variance. The head and heart of the country are in conflict, and civil war may any hour desolate the people. The anxiety of every patriot is heartrending. Gloom sits enthroned in every forehead. No description of Garibaldi's influence can enable a stranger to estimate aright the overwhelming enthusiasm entertained for him.

In Naples and throughout Sicily he is actually worshipped. The evangelist in Palermo declares it a universal atheistic madness. He has only to say the word, and the dictatorship of Sicily is his. The present breach of the law weighs not a feather with the Southerners, for by similar conduct in 1859 he scattered the Bourbon hordes, and gave freedom to the oppressed millions. It is true he is being surrounded by a fiery cordon of troops, but his forces are far larger than are represented by a servile telegraph. The troops of the Government cannot be in this case depended on, and the Sicilians and every organ of Sicilian opinion is with him to a man.

LIBERAL LEGISLATION WITH REFERENCE TO ECCLESIASTICS.

A large measure of justice has at last been done to the humbler orders of the clergy, who have hitherto been placed between two fires. If, differing from their superiors, they loved and favoured the new régime, they were excommunicated and persecuted; if, on the other hand, they obeyed their bishops, and showed hostility to Italy, they were punished by the Government. A law, proposed by Conforti, the Keeper of the Great Seal, has been passed triumphantly in Parliament, to restrain the episcopal abuse of power. Its provisions are, that no decree involving suspension or dismissal from ecclesiastical office can take effect in the kingdom unless drawn up in writing, with a full statement of the facts which warrant the step, to be laid before the secular magistrate for his judgment. The usual arbitrary procedure, ex informata conscientia, is abolished, and the liberty of defence granted to the accused. Further, it is ruled that while a beneficed priest may be deprived of office, no interference with the temporalities can take place without the consent of the Minister of Public Worship. All pastorals or other circulars must be submitted to the authorities before being printed and circulated in the dioceses. A 20*l.* fine, or six months' imprisonment, as the case may be, is the penalty attached to each contravention of this statute.

A hue and cry of persecution has been raised by the organs of the Church, which has brought this enactment upon itself by the removal of some of the ablest and most beloved parish priests, solely because of their sympathy with the liberal movement. I need not cite the many cases daily coming to light in the different provinces, showing a preconcerted line of action on the part of the bishops, or their substitutes, for many of them live at a distance from their dioceses. Strange to say, the jeremiads of the clerical party mourn, among other things, that the Attila of the present Government should have departed from the policy of Cavour, "A free Church in a free State!" As an evidence that this law is not vindictive, though insults and injuries might well have stirred resentment, but enacted in self-defence, it is very gratifying to see the enlightened criticism of the influential liberal press, proving that the relations between Church and State are to form as knotty a point in Italy as elsewhere. The vague citation before the secular powers of questions concerning ecclesiastical discipline or ceremonies is disapproved of. It is a usurpation for a lay judge to enter the sacristy. The compulsory reference to the Government of all published documents is plainly styled a breach of the liberty of the press, and a hindrance to the prompt discharge of diocesan work. The great defect of the bill, however, which must in time lead to important modifications, is that it only deals with the cases of beneficed priests, while the thousands who have no curacy are thrown by the intolerance of their superiors on the charges of the Government, instead of receiving an indemnity through the sequestration of a portion of the episcopal revenues, as is suggested. This law, I believe, will not remain a dead letter. Too many obstreperous ecclesiastics, and those chiefly in the lands formerly belonging to the Pope, have been consigned to prison to doubt the temper of Parliament. Two Carmelite friars, of Sienna, have this month entered on their twenty-and-six month's imprisonment respectively for the printing and circulation of two pamphlets most offensive to the cause of order. But not only are the liberal priests shielded from malicious superiors; positive encouragement is being given them. I formerly mentioned that the Chaplain-General of the Neapolitan districts continued, as under the Bourbons, to exercise the patronage to all the Royal chapels. As this gentleman is president of the Clerical Reform Association, his appointments have given great satisfaction to the people. The Government has just shown its approval of his conduct by committing to his care all the churches connected with the suppressed monasteries in the South, to which he is now nominating good men and true.

DEATH OF SIGNOR TECCHI, OF PISA.

The work of evangelization has sustained a great loss in the sudden death of Signor Tecchi, the minister of Pisa. A native of Verona, he occupied in 1848 a high position in the Milan Post-office. An exile in Genoa, in 1849, he heard the Gospel to the salvation of his soul from the lips of Signor Mazzarella. His wife participated with him in the spiritual blessing. He remained faithful to Christ amid much persecution and privation. For several years he has been an humble and earnest preacher in Genoa, Nice, and Pisa, labouring only and successfully for the conversion of souls. He had gained the esteem and love of the brethren in Pisa, who night and day waited beside the sick bed, and heard his expressions of strong confidence in God, and his dying instructions that his children should be trained in the fear of the Lord. He has been buried in the cemetery of the town, against the remonstrances of the priests, of whom the Prefect said to his friends, "They will not dare to disobey my orders. These gentlemen have forgotten that Tecchi was a Christian, as I myself am, and was baptized, as they have been." Mr. Tecchi had, for a long time, protested against the burial-place allotted to the evangelicals by the Mayor of Pisa, as it was the same in which criminals, abortions, and unbaptized infants were laid, and at the time of his death his efforts had proved successful, so that he was the first among the brethren to be buried beside his fellow-citizens, without distinction of creed or condition. He leaves a sorrowing widow and several children to the care of God and the faithful in Christ. These little ones support their mother's fainting heart. "Take courage, Mamma," said one of them; "God is so kind, He will help us. Papa is not dead; he sleeps in the Saviour's bosom."

FUNERAL OF GENERAL BECKWITH.

The mortal remains of Major-General Beckwith have lately been carried to the tomb, with all the honour which the profoundest admiration and the strongest affection could bestow. His praise is in all the churches, while the monuments of his faith and charity adorn the Waldensian Valleys. With the decision and endurance of the soldier and the unfeigned piety of the Christian disciple were beautifully blended in him the princely liberality of the philanthropist and the sagacity of the man of business. Espousing the cause of the unbefriended and oppressed Vaudois, and sojourning in their cold but hospitable retreats, he had abundant opportunity during thirty-five years of exercising his rare talents in the restoration to prosperity and usefulness of the "Israel of the Alps." He had a firm belief from the beginning that the Lord's time to favour Italy would come, and often exclaimed to his friends, when some striking event took place, "Didn't I tell you this ten years ago?" Italy is under special obligation to General Beckwith, in that all his gifts of money were wisely made to tell, not for the repression, but the excitement to self-exertion of his poor protégés. He loved to cultivate the sturdy independence of the Waldensian peasantry, and only helped those who helped themselves, whatever their circumstances of poverty might be. This invaluable principle, which lies at the root of every prosperous mission at home and abroad, has been too much overlooked in Italy. The fostering kindness of friends has overlaid the self-supporting energy of Italian Christianity. Bibles and books have been distributed gratis, while in the judgment of intelligent natives the people are as well to do as those of any other land, and only retain and appreciate that which is obtained by purchase. The salaries of evangelists and the expenses of the work have been defrayed in a manner which does not ensure either its permanence or extension. The contributions of a newly-evangelised community might not at first be large, but the true principle being duly enforced and carried out into action, they are an earnest to the practical missionary of life and progress. I am glad to know that efforts are being made to attain to a better state of things in this matter, which was the regulating thought in all the General's plans, and the secret of his large success. His name will long remain a household word, and his memory be blessed through many generations.

DISGRACEFUL CAREER OF A VENETIAN PRIEST.

One of those vile hypocrites who live on the charitable confidence of the Christian public, and practice a lifelong deception without shame, has been suddenly arrested in his career of crime at Naples. Cassiano de Col, a Venetian priest, after troubling the Waldensian and other brethren, betook himself to London, in 1852, with a document, dated Lugano, purporting to emanate from a committee of Protestants, and signed by 300 priests. Unfortunately, his story was believed, and various sums of money were supplied with which to carry on his work in Northern Italy.

One of our most esteemed clergymen in England, however, came to this country to verify the remarkable promises of De Col, if possible, and visited, for this purpose, Voghera, Brescia, Milan, Turin, and other towns. The result of this visit, given in the Christian Remembrancer, for 1857, was the discovery that none of the parties whose names were adhibited to the document had really signed it, that thirty of these pretended reforming priests had been arrested by the Austrian police through information given by De Col himself, and that the fabricator of the whole story had been removed to the confines of Switzerland by the authorities in Piedmont, on account of bad behaviour. No other conclusion could be come to than that the man was a clerical spy in the Austrian pay. A few letters—which were published, of indignation on the one side, and insult on the other—passed between the parties, and the Univers followed up the question by a defence of the secret partisan of the Church.

In 1861, De Col reappeared in Naples, and as an exiled reforming priest, was admitted into the Liberal Clerical Association of that town, lodged for a time by the kind-hearted president, through whose kind offices he received 20*l.* from the commission for redressing the grievances of suffering patriots, and 36*s.* a week, up till the day of his arrest, from the ecclesiastical treasury. Advanced to the secretaryship of the society, he was soon dismissed from the office, and from the body, for various ungenerous attempts to compromise the associates, by representing them as non-Catholics in their doctrines in the public prints of France and Italy. Thereafter he applied to the Evangelical-Aid Society of Naples for employment, but Signor Albarella declined his services, by reason of sundry disagreeable rumours which had reached his ears. Returning again to the Liberal Clerical Association, and expressing regret for his past behaviour, he was reinstated in December last; but was a second time expelled for a violent attack on the evangelicals of Naples, prompted by their rejection of his services, which he inserted in the organ of the Association, the Colonna di Fuoco. From that hour he was by tongue and pen an open and violent foe of both evangelicals and reforming priests, scattering widely the most injurious statements. About this time, two letters which had long lain in the Roman post-office here returned to Naples, which post-mark they bore. According to law, they were opened, in order to be returned to the writer or destroyed. The first was on the point of being thrown into the fire, as an unimportant communication, when the second was found to inform the party in Rome to whom it was addressed, that a former letter had been sent with a few meaningless phrases, but that by passing a solution of sulphate of zinc over the blank sheet something most valuable for the progress of the holy cause would be found, which was to be communicated to Cardinal Antonelli. The hint was taken by the authorities in Naples, and a long letter came to view, offering, "through the party of action, to force on the liberals to republican sentiments and every kind of excess, that disorder might lead to order"—namely, the restoration of the fallen princes, and the restitution of the lost provinces to Austria and the Pope. The writer, who pretended great influence with the party of action, and predicted certain success, signed himself "Ferretti." No such person could be found by the police; but one day a letter came to hand, applying for a situation at a moderate salary, which from the similarity of handwriting and certain orthographic errors, was at once supposed by an official to be from the same pen. De Col was at once arrested, first denied, and then confessed his crime, and many more; in deep remorse explained the villany of his past life, made an effort to take his own life, and is now lying at the Neapolitan hospital, convalescent, and awaiting the judgment of the tribunal.

THE PRIESTS STIRRING UP THE PEOPLE AGAINST THE PROTESTANTS.

The evangelical cause still gains a footing, and makes head amid much opposition. Last spring a very able set of preachers occupied the Florentine pulpits; a Sicilian monk in particular employed a fiery enthusiasm and powerful eloquence in the denunciation of Protestantism, and greatly moved the people. As yet there are no men of equal power to defend the truth and influence the masses, though the loud and constant attacks prove the slow but steady advance of the hated heresy. At Arezzo and Lucca the liberty of obtaining and holding a place in which to worship God according to conscience is combated with keenness and energy by the priests. At Bagni di Lucca the evangelist cannot get a female servant, so compact and resolute is the action of those who oppose themselves. In Parma and Modena, where the archbishop has entered the lists with a violent excommunication, the meetings are crowded, and sympathy has been shown by the press and people of the districts. At Verres the hymn of solemn worship is drowned by the noise of a hired brass band at the entrance of the church. In Elba, where the Word of God has had free course, the enemy stirs up evil men to do their utmost to extirpate the new opinions. Though Portoferrario, the capital town, now acquiesces in liberty of conscience and of worship to the evangelicals, Rio and Longone are full of petty acts of violence towards the pastors and their friends. The visit of Prince Napoleon to the former place, and his interview with M. Marchand, the young Waldensian missionary there, has done good. He expressed surprise at the existence of fifty Protestants in such an out-of-the-way place, and regretted that instead of having a chapel of their own, they were subjected to constant vexation. Insults are offered in the street to the evangelist, disturbing noises are got up outside the place of meeting, and when the authorities take the matter in hand, witnesses are afraid to give a truthful testimony. One of the principal offenders, a shopkeeper, is now enduring a month's imprisonment, and has been made to pay a considerable fine. A Catholic female teacher has been converted and opened an evangelical school, and the little flock is not dismayed by the violence of ignorance and superstition. In Longone similar disgraceful scenes are enacted. The faith and patience of the disciples are put to the severest test. Stones are thrown at the head of one; a criminal process for speaking against the religion of the State is sought to be raised, happily in vain, against another; while others are pointed out with epithets of execration by vendors of tracts on the merits of the Madonna. In the face of all these difficulties the good work goes forward, the mass of fanatics is being invaded by an unseen but strong Christian influence, and the blessing of union, devotedness, and Christian love enrich the assemblies of the saints.

OUTRAGE AGAINST PROTESTANTS AT MILAN.

I regret to say that something still more serious has occurred at Milan. Of late a series of bitter diatribes against the Government, the present liberties guaranteed by the State, and the errors of Protestantism, have been delivered by the priest of Gentilino, outside the Ticino gate. Several evangelicals, among them the ministers of the various Protestant congregations of the town, have been in the habit of attending. On Sabbath, 27th of July, as soon as the preacher had said, "Last Sabbath I spoke to you of Luther and Calvin, to-day I shall lecture on the morals of Protestants," loud yells and fiendish grins from the other end of the church were raised. Men dressed in black drew from under cover huge sticks, and began to lay about them in a savage manner, exclaiming, "Destroy the heretics!" A well-known reactionary priest in the assembly shouted, "Give it them, give it them! Slay the Protestants!" Meanwhile the preacher stood and gazed upon the confusion and bloody attack, which had all been arranged beforehand, like Nero on the blazing city, fired by his own orders. All who were known or suspected to be Protestants were struck on the head and otherwise violently treated. Several of the bleeding victims, who were lying helpless, implored mercy in the name of Christ in vain. Had not an evangelical escaped early from the fray, and brought the police immediately to the spot, the most revolting carnage would have ensued. Several arrests were made, while the wounded were removed to the hospital. Aware of the importance of lodging a false version of the disgraceful occurrence in the public mind, the promoters of the outrage sedulously supplied reports to the daily papers, in which the Protestants were represented as exciting the disturbance by shouts of "Down with the Jesuit!" which from the testimony of eye-witnesses is known to be entirely false. Meanwhile a searching examination has been entered into by the authorities.

MARRIAGE OF A PRIEST.

Your French correspondent will inform you of the important legal decision, whereby an ex-priest of Périgueux has contracted marriage and been shielded in so doing by the Code Napoleon. The question of the marriage of priests who continue doing duty in the Church is occupying attention in Italy, and is favourably considered. The project of a law on the subject has for the present been withdrawn, as the people are not thought ready for legislation on the point. Meanwhile the priest Antonio Giovanetti, of Bologna, has been united in the bonds of holy matrimony with Domenica Capanni. The marriage certificate was received by the notary Calendrelli, the witnesses being Dr. Zani and an ex-monk, Pompeo Rossi, now a Protestant. Such a step as this—taken with the concurrence of the civil power, and regardless of ecclesiastical prohibition—shows how the current is running.

DEGRADING SUPERSTITIONS.

The gross darkness that prevails among the countryfolk, and which the Church of Rome, if it has not brought it about for its own interests, fosters, instead of dispelling, has shown itself lately at Caravaggio, in the heart of Lombardy, in opposition to the improvements of the age. A line of rail is being laid down in that quarter, sacred for a famous Madonna shrine, from which a holy spring flows, feeding a small lake, of which the numerous fish, when eaten in a dried state, are accounted useful in healing certain diseases. The priest of the neighbourhood looks with suspicion on the "iron way," and so influenced his parishioners, that, 6,000 in number, they attacked and destroyed the new railway station, to the cry of "Down with the men who insult the Virgin by destroying the old highway!" The labourers were compelled to fly, and the works have been suspended for the present.

Similar credulity was seen the other day in Pisa, the city of priests, on the occasion of the festival of St. Ranieri, the patron saint of the town. The superb cathedral is in holiday attire, the tomb of the saint is uncovered, and some miraculous water from the well of San Ranieri, the ordinary well of the church, is placed on a table before the altar in a large basin. Such a gathering of halt, lame, blind, and diseased is only seen on that day even in Pisa, which travellers consider infested with beggars, who by importunate beggary prevent any leisurely inspection of the famous monuments. The miraculous water is the attraction. It is a panacea. Eyes, heads, and legs, are bathed in the sacred fluid, which soon becomes so polluted, that it needs to be changed by the attendants, though the faith of some believers has so wholly swallowed up their taste, that even in this condition they refuse not to drink it for the cure of internal disorders. Would that such impositions were rare! Alas! from Naples, with its shrine of St. Januarius, down to the village of Rimini, with its winking Madonna, there is no place of consequence in wide Italy which is not heathenised by some local superstition of a similar nature. The clergy make no effort to relieve the people of such pagan impositions, which among the uneducated produce the most bigoted faith in the incantations and exorcisms of the Church, and drive the intelligent into the more rational absurdities of infidelity.

Frankfort, August 12, 1862.

A THEOLOGICAL CONTROVERSY.

In Germany, the principal religious questions are discussed scientifically, with reference to systems of theology, rather than in a practical manner, so as to interest the entire Church and the religious life in the soul. A discussion of this kind may occupy a long time, and divide the opinions of learned men, without the public taking the least part in it. There are sometimes exceptional circumstances, however, when a controversy may become a matter of importance; such is the case when the question at issue relates to different religious parties. It must also be admitted that there is a tendency in grave religious questions to emerge more and more from the schools of learning, where they were formerly known to the initiated only, and to spread among all who take an interest in the Church. The channels by which this diffusion takes place are the numerous religious journals, which, without being properly scientific, can no longer abstain from making their readers acquainted with theological discussions. Thus it is that, of late, they have echoed with a somewhat bitter theological controversy between some of the professors of our universities. The men in question all decidedly profess their faith in Divine revelation and in the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Hence the interest with which the controversy is viewed is all the more intense.

A savant, hitherto known for his rigid orthodoxy, and belonging to the ultra-Lutheran party, whose principles he has defended in various scientific and polemical writings—I refer to Dr. Kahnis, professor in the University of Leipsic—brought out, last year, a work on “Dogmatics,” or systematic theology, in which his readers, to their astonishment, found him teaching the most liberal principles. The confessions of faith of the Lutheran Church are only referred to by him respectfully, as venerable documents expressive of the faith of the fathers; the author, in his learned investigations, does not feel himself bound by them. If he does not deny their spirit, he at least does not make himself the slave of the letter. So he enunciates, respecting the absolute authority of the canon of Scripture, the old theory of inspiration, the authenticity of such or such a book in the Bible, the Athanasian Creed, the Trinity and the Person of Christ, and even respecting the doctrine of the Lord’s Supper—views which differ from the Lutheran confessions of faith.

Does this afford sufficient reason to declare that Dr. Kahnis has “fallen from the faith?” This, at least, is what Dr. Hengstenberg has thought it his duty to do in the Evangelical Gazette. The Berlin professor, in pronouncing this harsh judgment, has done nothing more than follow his usual style of controversy, which consists in attacking the persons and aspersing the character of those who differ from him, instead of discussing their principles and refuting their errors. Dr. Kahnis had previously been the friend of Dr. Hengstenberg; he had often written in the Gazette, and fought under the same colours. Now, because of differences of opinion which touch neither the essence of Christianity nor the salvation of souls, Hengstenberg says publicly to his friend, “I know thee no longer.”

Other theologians of the same party—Drs. Dieckhoff and Munkel—have not been slow in attacking the heretic, and in employing the same weapons against him. It was their right and their duty to engage in the contest according to their convictions—on condition, however, of discussing facts and principles, without condemning the person as having fallen from the faith, and having been led away by Rationalism.

Dr. Kahnis could not remain under the weight of these accusations without replying and justifying his views before the whole Church, before which tribunal he had been cited. This he has done, in a composition which now lies before me, and which I have read with real interest. Its title is, “Testimony to the Fundamental Truths of Protestantism, against Dr. Hengstenberg. Leipsic, 1862.” I am very far, for my part, from sharing all the views of the Leipsic professor, either upon the Scriptures, or upon some of these fundamental truths. But how can a divine be accused of Rationalism who makes the following declaration respecting the authority of Scripture: “No criticism can shake the Mosaic origin of the Law, nor the divinity of the prophetic Word, nor the real truth of the miraculous history of the Old Testament, nor the Divine accents of the Psalms, which find an echo in every pious heart, nor the apostolic testimony as to the person and work of Christ, nor the revealed contents of the Epistles of Paul, of Peter, and of John.” How can one refuse to allow that the Christian faith is held by a man who defines the essence of Christianity as being “communion of the individual soul with God, by Jesus Christ, through the Holy Spirit?” It is by this true and beautiful definition that Dr. Kahnis escapes from the error of his adversaries, which consists in viewing Christianity as a doctrine, a system, instead of seeing in it a life—the life of the soul.

It is impossible but that there should be theological and religious struggles, so long as we are in our present state of imperfect knowledge. But truth, as well as brotherly love, would be in every respect the gainer if controversialists, free from all party spirit, always knew how to make these three important distinctions: 1st, between Divine truth, revealed in the Word of God, and human formulas, by which attempts have been at all times made to define those truths; 2ndly, between doctrine and the life which it is intended to produce; 3rdly, between a man's views and his personal character as a Christian.

THE BAPTISTS AND THE NATIONAL CHURCH.

If there are contests in the domain of theology, there are others also, and quite as inevitable, in the Church. One of the most lively character is taking place at the present moment in Germany, between the Baptists and the National Church. One cannot but commend the zeal and activity displayed by our Baptist brethren throughout Germany, where they have already forty-seven congregations, more or less numerous. But as the men employed in this mission do not possess all the knowledge that is desirable, and as they are not all animated by a sufficiently enlarged and tolerant spirit towards their brethren belonging to the National Churches, the latter, right or wrong, charge them with attacking, in unmeasured terms, the Establishment, calling it a Babel, and accusing of infidelity Christians who remain members of it, in order to draw them over to themselves. Whether these accusations are well founded or not, it is certain that, on this ground, multitudes of pastors and private Christians keep aloof from the Evangelical Alliance, and abandon all fraternal intercourse with members of other communions. This painful fact was publicly pointed out, by more than one pastor, at the Berlin Conference, in 1857; and I know that the same cause operated to prevent almost all our brethren of the National Church of Wurtemberg from going to Geneva last year.

In view of these facts, so sad in themselves, here is another, which affords legitimate ground for rejoicing. The Baptist congregations of Germany, Denmark, Switzerland, and Alsace, have just signed and published a Declaration, in which they themselves complain of the false accusations of which they are often the objects, and boldly disavow every unjust judgment and every harsh word with which some of their members are chargeable. They declare that their principal end is to preach faith in a crucified and exalted Saviour, as the only means whereby men can be saved; that their principle is to preach the Word, apart from human systems, and to support others in their different views; and they claim, on their own behalf, the right and the duty of openly expressing their convictions, without this liberty being threatened by measures of restraint. They repel the charge made against them of proceeding by aggressive and proselyting means, and especially of drawing to themselves the living members of National Churches, instead of setting themselves to convert the dead members. In fine, they refute various prejudices which exist in the public mind respecting their doctrines and the essential principles of their congregations.

In general, this declaration is drawn up in a good spirit, and is adapted to conciliate public opinion in favour of our Baptist brethren. The impression which it has produced would have been better still if there had been a fuller and more ingenuous acknowledgment of some of the charges made against many of their missionaries, as to their opinions and proceedings respecting the National Churches. To speak particularly, I do not believe that they can get rid of the reproach of drawing to baptism and to their congregations the living members of the Established Church, instead of drawing to Christ the dead members. If such is the fact, it is better to acknowledge than to deny it; it would be more straightforward to say that in this matter also they act according to their convictions. On the other hand, it is certain that the pastors belonging to the National Churches—having hitherto been in the sole possession of their respective parishes, accustomed to the exclusive spiritual oversight of the population, looking upon themselves as much functionaries of the State as of the Church, and regarding the new comers as intruders, who usurp their authority—have everything to learn with respect to religious liberty and the toleration of independent communions. They will serve their apprenticeship to this kind of knowledge, and the best of them will speedily see that the holy emulation thus enkindled will awaken their own Church from death. It must be added, however, that the Lutheran doctrine on the baptism of children will always make them regard the Baptists as enemies to the truth. This contrast may itself be productive of good results. Ah! if Christ, and Christ alone, were all in all, they would very soon stretch forth the hand to lead to Him the multitudes who are perishing in their ignorance and worldly-mindedness.

THE PRINCESS ALICE.

I have something to say about the country—about a village of the Grand Duchy of Darmstadt, at the foot of the beautiful Odenwald mountains, between Darmstadt and Heidelberg. I was yesterday the witness of a popular demonstration which I am sure will be grateful to every English heart. There is in a retired and lovely valley, near the village of Auerbach, a château, whither your amiable Princess Alice and her august husband arrived, to pass a few weeks during the season. All the rural population was on foot to bid them welcome, beneath a triumphal arch, which had been erected at the entrance of the village. The faithful and pious pastor of the place was requested to express to the future sovereign of the country and to his beloved bride the good wishes of his parishioners. His words, I can assure you, coming from the depths of his heart, implored every blessing from God upon this young couple, whom every one looked upon with the deepest interest and emotion. A thrice-repeated Hoch! from all who were present was like the Amen to his little address. The Princess Alice, who is popular and beloved in this little State, appeared happy and in good health. May peace from above be hers throughout her career, and may every Divine consolation be imparted to her Royal mother in her great affliction!

THE PRUSSIAN UNIVERSITY CONTROVERSY: AN INSTRUCTIVE CONTRAST.

An occasional correspondent favours us with the following important facts and observations upon a matter which is now exciting considerable attention among the educated classes of Germany, and of which but very little has been heard in this country:—

Bonn, July 25, 1862.

There is a fierce controversy raging now in Germany on the question of the universities. It originated with the Ultramontane party among the Catholics, and is mainly conducted by them. They assert that the Prussian Government is partial in the appointment of professors and teachers both in the universities and gymnasiums; that though the laws favour the Catholics, yet the actual rules, for more than one hundred years, have, as far as possible, deprived the Catholics of the benefit of them; that the Roman Catholics are discountenanced in the most glaring manner; and that neither law nor justice is held sacred in what concerns the Catholic Church. This is the heavy accusation which is brought against the Prussian Government, and certainly the facts brought forward seem, at first sight, to give weight to it. The six complete universities in Prussia are Berlin, Bonn, Breslau, Halle, Königsberg, Griefswald, and Münster. Halle and Königsberg are exclusively Protestant; Griefswald is also by statute Protestant, but one or two Catholic professors are in practice admitted; Bonn and Breslau are by statute parity-universities, in which Protestants and Catholics are equally eligible to all the non-theological chairs; Münster is entirely Catholic; and as to Berlin, the question is not decided whether it is a parity or an exclusively Protestant university. The State support is administered annually in the following manner, and I would remind the English reader that the thaler is three shillings.—

Stammung.		Thalers.	Thalers.
Berlin	179,890	Königsberg.	84,422
Bonn	115,830	Griefswald ...	1,200
Breslau	85,803	Münster	2,550
Halle	61,465

Münster, though not a university, I have placed along with the universities, as it is endowed by the State, and has a philosophical and theological faculty. Let us note down some facts concerning these high schools, that the English reader may get a glance at the working of the system of education in Prussia.

1. Of Halle, Königsberg, and Münster;

we need say little or nothing, as they are strictly sectarian. By the principles of their foundation the professors must be limited to one religious party. The same may be said of Griefswald, though the spirit of the age seems to be breaking down its restrictions, and occasionally a Roman Catholic professor is admitted. The Academy or University of Münster is absolutely Catholic, and, true to the spirit of exclusiveness, no Protestant professor is admitted.

2. Berlin. In this university there is no theological faculty for the Catholics, though it does not appear that they might not have one, if they pleased. In the other faculties Catholics and Jews are freely admitted as well as Protestants. In the faculty of Jurisprudence there are 10 professors, all Protestant, 1 Protestant tutor, 3 Protestant and 1 Catholic extraordinary professor—so that of the 13 professors of law, 1 only is Catholic. The medical faculty has 13 ordinary and 8 extraordinary professors, of whom one is a Jew. There are no Catholic professors in this faculty. In the philosophical faculty there are 25 ordinary Protestant professors and 1 Catholic, 2 sodales academiae literariae Protestants, 29 Protestant and 1 Catholic extraordinary professor. Hence, without reckoning the Protestant faculty of theology, the University of Berlin has on the whole 92 professors, of whom 3 are Catholic, 1 is Jewish, and the rest are Protestant.

3. The University of Breslau is founded and conducted on the principle of absolute parity between the Catholics and the Protestants. Each party has its own theological faculty, and all the other chairs are open to the most accomplished candidates, whatever may be their religion. Now here again it is remarkable how the Protestants prevail in all the chairs that are open to the competition of both parties. If we take the period from 1811 till 1861, the relation between the parties during the past fifty years will stand thus: In law, there were 18 Protestants and 3 Catholics; in medicine, 24 Protestants and 5 Catholics; in philosophy, 60 Protestants and 15 Catholics—that is to say, during these fifty years past, in the three faculties which are open to the general public, there were 102 Protestant, and only 23 Catholic professors.

4. The University of Bonn is also based on the mixed or parity principle. It has two absolutely equal and independent faculties of theology, one for the Catholics, and one for the Protestants. Each of these has by statute six ordinary professors, each of whom receives on an average 1,000 thalers (or 150*l.*) a-year from the State. The other faculties are open to free competition, except that there must be at least one Catholic professor in each of the faculties of jurisprudence and philosophy. This concession was demanded by the Catholics, lest all the chairs in these two important faculties should be occupied by Protestants. But it shows clearly how much they are afraid of free competition. How then does it stand at present in the mixed faculties—in those faculties which are filled up on the principle of putting the right man in the right place? As usual in this country, the Protestants show their superiority. This is proved by the present state of the university. During the year 1861 there were in the faculty of jurisprudence 8 ordinary and 2 extraordinary professors, receiving from the State 11,100 thalers, and of these 6 were Protestant and 4 Catholic. In the medical faculty the difference is still more striking; for there were 10 Protestant, and only 2 Catholics. Philosophy never prospered, and never can prosper, among the Ultramontanes, who are bound hand and foot by the shackles of authority, and hence, in the University of Bonn, we have the striking fact that during the past year, among the 26 ordinary professors of philosophy, there were only 6, and among the 11 extraordinary only 4 Catholics. This faculty received, during the past year, from the State 33,800 thalers.

These are certainly striking facts, and over them the Jesuits are gnashing their teeth in extreme agony. Their favourite cry is that the Government is partial, that there is no fair play in the public administration, and that there is a general conspiracy against the Catholic faith. This Jesuitical bray is echoed from university to university, from gymnasium to gymnasium, throughout the kingdom; it is murmured in the halls of the Parliament, and seems likely to become the watchword of a party in the State. Thus they seek to turn their defeat into a victory. They are beaten on every field of science and literature in the struggle of manly competition, and then, because Protestant intelligence comes off victorious, they raise the cry of partiality. Never was there anything more false. The Government, if inclined to any side, would naturally take the side of authority and conservatism; but there is, in fact, no example in the history of the public administration where a less-accomplished man has, on account of his Protestantism, been preferred to a superior Roman Catholic. The object of the parity-principle evidently is, to secure the best men—the most accomplished scholars—whether they be Catholic or Protestant. Religion is no bar to advancement in the State. Acquire superior fitness, and you are certain to attain superior position. This is the generous principle which lies at the base of the national system of education in Prussia, and the result has been, as we have seen, that the main streams of literature and science flow in Protestant channels. But the Ultramontanes understand parity in a quite different sense. They mean by parity simply an equality as to number. "You are to have sixty professors in such a university, then give us thirty of the chairs; you are to have fifty in another, and we claim twenty-five of them for the Catholics." "By no means," says the Government; "we shall make no such arrangement, for the honour of the nation depends on the celebrity of our universities; but furnish you the most accomplished men in the different fields of knowledge, and instead of thirty, we shall give you the entire sixty professorships. We seek the best professors, and we shall take them, wherever we can get them." This is the parity principle of Prussia.

A strong cross light is thrown on the literary position of the two great parties in Germany by the conduct of Catholic nations. Almost all learned societies in every country seek to incorporate among them the great celebrities of foreign nations. Vienna has its academy, and surely Austria cannot be charged with partiality towards Protestants; and yet of the seven foreign honorary members in the department of Orientalism, one only is a Catholic; and of the fifteen corresponding members thirteen are Protestants; the three honorary foreign members for the department of Mathematics and Natural History are all Protestants; and the nineteen correspondents in the same department are all Protestants but two. Such is the testimony of the most learned society of one of the most intensely Catholic countries in the world. Look now at Bavaria, which may come next after Austria in Catholic sympathies and tendencies, and what do we find in the Academy of Munich? We find the testimony to the superiority of Protestant intelligence equally solid and convincing. In the department of philology there are 39 German foreign members, and of these 32 are Protestant and 6 Catholic; in physics, 1 Catholic and 5 Protestants; in chemistry the 4 German members are all Protestants; in zoology all are Protestants; in botany 4 are Protestants and 2 Catholic; and of the 26 members in the department of history 16 are Protestants. France is no exception to the rule, for the same principle is manifested in the celebrated French Academy. In the year 1861 there were 49 German members, and of these 1 was a Jew, 6 were Catholics, and 42 Protestants. Of these 49 members all Austria contributed only 3, while Berlin alone gave 23, and Bonn 8, and it is remarkable that all the literary members from Bavaria are Protestants. These are surely striking facts, which make the hue and cry about the Protestant partiality of Prussia ridiculous. Is Austria partial to the Protestants? Or Bavaria? Or the French Academy? No, but the solemn truth is that the Catholic communities are behind the times; they are entangled with the traditions of authority, so that the intellect has not free scope for development. Let us not rejoice in this, but rather let us rejoice that a pure Gospel having made us free by its heavenly light, sheds over every department of mind and of matter its ennobling illustration.

Yours truly,

AUSTRIA.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY AND THE AUSTRIAN PROTESTANTS.

In the following letter an English gentleman, long resident upon the Continent, gives the result of his inquiries upon several points of interest during a recent tour in Austria:—

Stuttgart, July 21, 1862.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY AND THE EMPEROR'S PATENT.

... The first point I will refer to is the question of religious liberty, and how far it is enjoyed in the present moment in Austria. The Patent of April 8, 1861, in reference to the Protestant Church in Austria (Hungary excluded), and the Ordinances founded on the same, of April 9, 1861, was a subject of great exultation to many Christians in Great Britain, Germany, and other countries. There would have been far less of this feeling if the twenty-five paragraphs of the former, and the 198 paragraphs of the latter, had been more thoroughly examined, and if this kind of legislation had been better understood out of Austria. More than a year has elapsed since the Patent was issued, and a more correct appreciation of its worth can now be made. In the first place, the Patent and Ordinances are not law, as many erroneously believe, except so far as no existing laws are opposed to them, in which case only, as civilians assert, they can be legally carried into effect.

In the House of Commons in Austria there are only three Protestants, of whom one only, Pastor ———, speaks decidedly when Protestantism is concerned. On the 27th of last month he complained in the Chambers that the Protestants were still compelled in different places to pay the old fees, &c., to the Roman Catholic clergy, and to pay Roman Catholic schoolmasters, even where they had their own schools; and he called on the Ministry to introduce the promised bills in the House to carry out the Patent and Ordinances, and make them the law of the land, that they might be no longer an "illusion." This is a strong expression, but it is nevertheless only too accurate.

THE PROTESTANT CHURCH AND THE PATENT.

The Ordinances founded on the Patent are especially occupied with a new constitution for the Protestant Church in Austria (exclusive of Hungary); but before referring to them we will just notice the former government of the Church. The governing body was a consistory, the members of which were appointed by the Emperor, and resided in Vienna. The president was a Roman Catholic lawyer; and such was the enmity of the Protestant members to evangelical religion and to Roman Catholics renouncing Popery, that such persons have told me that they received more protection from the Roman Catholic president than from the Protestant clergy who were members of the consistory, and who were the complete tools of Government, as well as, alas! the chief clergymen in Vienna. An author has said they preached everything but the Gospel. In short, the most ultra-Rationalism prevailed, and if it is now not quite so piquant as formerly, yet it is to be found at present nowhere in Germany so vulgar as in Vienna.

The Protestant Theological Faculty of Vienna deserved scarcely the name of Christian; and if at present a shade better than formerly, this is nearly as much as can be said of it. In a conversation I had, in 1848, with one of the professors, he said that our Saviour did not die on the cross—that He was only “apparently dead”—and such views he continues to teach at this moment, without rebuke. The Rationalism in this faculty outdoes that in any German university. The only pleasing fact respecting it is, that there are at present only thirty-two students for the six professors of theology.

The limits of a letter would not suffice to criticise the 223 paragraphs of the Patent and Ordinances, which mostly refer to the new organization of the Protestant Church, the machinery of which is very complicated. In the parishes are presbyteries and select vestries; several parishes form a seniorate, choosing a senior and his council, and two or more seniorates choose a superintendent and his council, over which is the General Synod, the Supreme Ecclesiastical Council, and the Emperor. The basis is democratic to the fullest extent, but the higher we go the structure becomes more and more hierarchical. The Supreme Ecclesiastical Council (Oberkirchenbehörde) is only another name for what was formerly called the Upper Consistory, which has to lay before the Government, for its approval, all matters except such as relate to doctrine. The two most objectionable points—and there are very many more—are that the superintendents, hitherto pastors receiving some 500 florins a year, and some 300 more as superintendents, are in future to have no pastoral charge, and are to receive from the Government some three or four thousand florins a year, thus becoming the complete servants of the State. There is a great cry being raised against this from different quarters. The Emperor has granted, this year, 27,960 florins for the seven superintendents, and for their expenses. Secondly, the decisions of the Synod, before they can be carried into effect, must receive the approval of the Supreme Ecclesiastical Board, and in most cases that of the Government also. Another bad feature of the Patent is the monies promised (some sums already granted) by the Emperor to the Protestant Church, and which will also tend still more to enslave it. Some few persons hope that the General Synod, when it assembles, which, however, will not be this year, will be able to obtain more freedom of action, in different points, for the Ordinances make the Protestant Church the complete slave of the Supreme Ecclesiastical Council.

Few of the general principles of the Patent have been carried into effect; but among those which have is a greater liberty in procuring Protestant books from abroad, and printing Protestant works in Austria, although the censorship, with all its apparatus, still exists. In May, 1861, the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society for Austria, relying on the Patent, applied for permission to establish depôts, but although fifteen months have elapsed, the Government has not yet returned any answer to the request.

MISTAKES IN CHURCH BUILDING.

There is no doubt that in the German Protestant parishes or congregations in Austria there is now, in general, less evangelical life than in 1848, although many, in reading accounts from Austria of meetings, &c., of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society, for building churches, and what this society is doing for Austria, might easily be led to a contrary conclusion. After carefully reflecting upon what the society is doing, and has done, in Austria, I am exceedingly doubtful whether it has not done as much harm as good. I will give examples of what I mean from the province of Upper Austria. The building of a new church in Wels was begun in 1848, and has cost upwards of 6,000*l.* sterling. This was the first church in this part of Austria built with a steeple (for before 1848 steeples were not allowed). A church is now building in Hallstadt, where a short time ago the congregation applied to the Government for 15*l.* a year to increase the income of the minister, which was granted, as the people are all employed in the Government salt-mines, and are also very poor. The church will cost at least 5,000*l.* sterling; the arches of the doors are of polished marble. In the next parish, that of Gosau, the steeple to a new church is finished, for the people said, “If we build the church first, we should perhaps not get money enough to build a steeple; but if the tower and steeple are first built, there will be no difficulty in getting the money to build the church.” In the next parish, that of Goisern, a steeple has been built to the old church that has cost about a thousand pounds sterling, which the people chiefly raised among themselves, although not a hundred florins could be raised in the congregation for an infant-school. New churches were wanted in these places, but it is not right to build them in this lavish style with monies from Gustavus-Adolphus Societies. The “altars” in the new churches in this part are quite similar to those in large Roman Catholic churches. In short, there is, alas! too great a desire to vie with the Roman Catholic Church, and to outdo her in outward forms and appearance. It is much to be deplored that the Gustavus-Adolphus Society and its auxiliaries promote this spirit, not troubling themselves in the least about the preaching of the Gospel. In short, churches are often built in which anything but the Gospel is preached.

WHAT CAN BE DONE FOR THE SPREAD OF THE GOSPEL?

It may naturally be asked, what can now best be done for the spread of the Gospel in Austria? This is a very difficult question to reply to in a general manner, for in different parts of the empire, and in the different languages spoken, different means could and should be used. The free circulation of the Bible is at this moment, as mentioned, attended with difficulties; but tracts and religious publications can be largely circulated. The greatest want, on the whole, of the Protestants in Austria is elementary, or village schools, for in many parts a very great number, if not the majority, of the children of a Protestant congregation attend Roman Catholic schools, on account of their often living at great distances from each other. These remarks do not refer to Hungary, where even now more liberty, in general, prevails than in other parts of Austria, and where the state of the Protestants is quite different from those of the one hundred and sixty-five congregations scattered over the other provinces of Austria. Hungary possesses more than one seminary for the training of schoolmasters; but the Protestants of the rest of Austria have not a single institution of the kind. Yet they much need it, for their schoolmasters are obliged, at present, to get their instruction in Roman Catholic establishments.

WEAKNESS OF THE GOVERNMENT A GAIN TO RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

The political state of Austria has always great influence on religious liberty in general. Liberal-minded Austrians rejoiced at the defeat of their army in Italy; for if their fatherland had been victorious 1833 and less liberty would have been allowed in the different provinces of the empire. The present state of the finances in Austria has the same influence. You may travel for weeks in Austria, and never see a six-kreuzer (now ten-kreuzer) or twopenny-piece, but only bank-notes of ten kreuzer, or twopence, and copper money. The Government refuses to take its own notes for custom-house duties, which must be paid in silver purchased in the last few weeks, with a premium of twenty-four to twenty-seven per cent.; but what is still more singular, the Austrian custom-house refuses to take Austrian gold coin of any kind. As long as the finances are in such a state, we may at least reckon on a considerable portion of liberty being allowed; for if this were not the case the discontent against paper money would probably increase to an alarming degree.

TURKEY.

For the following accounts from the mission-field of Turkey we are indebted to the Secretary of the Turkish Missions Aid Society:—

NATIVE EFFORTS FOR THE SPREAD OF THE GOSPEL IN SYRIA.

A native missionary society has been formed at Beirut amongst the Protestants, which holds its meetings on the first Monday of each month for business. At the last meeting Mr. Bistany, as president, stated that the society has in the two months sent a missionary to Homs and a colporteur to Jezzin district, maintained religious worship at Kefi Sima, and employed a city missionary in Beyrout. The native brother labouring at Homs reports a hopeful state of things. A large number of Protestants, whom persecution had scared, had returned to the Greek Church, but they commenced a Bible-class in the Greek Church itself, thus bringing the truth into contact with others. About fifteen stood firm, and never ceased to meet nightly the native preacher, to study God's Word and pray together. The report of the brother labouring in Beyrout was given verbally. Besides Sabbath services, every evening meetings, attended by forty to seventy persons, are held in different parts of the city. Much interest is excited, and there is a great desire among the people to have their houses preferred. The missionary stated that he preaches the Gospel in the aggregate to not less than 350 souls weekly, a great part of whom do not attend regular Sabbath services.

PERSECUTION OF PROTESTANTS IN THE LEBANON.

The mountain village of Ain Zehalty, originally Greek, had become so enlightened, that several months ago their church building had been given up for Protestant worship. Since the Syrian outbreak and the subsequent appointment, through Russian and French influences, of the present Governor of Lebanon. Daoud Pasha, the church has been taken from them; and now four Protestants are cast into prison. The priests and monks control the Governor, and use the Moslem soldiery to carry out their purposes. Protestants are compelled by a Turkish captain to furnish wood and barley for the soldiery, whilst the Papists are exempted. Protestants are insulted, threatened, and imprisoned. The British Government has its special commissioner here, who finds it next to impossible to do anything to better this state of affairs. Murder and robbery are rife about Damascus, but the Lebanon is quiet, with the exception of the persecution of Protestants. One of the four Protestants now imprisoned by this arbitrary Daoud Pasha is an inoffensive boy, son of our native preacher. There is no doubt that the impunity which the Druses and Moslem soldiery enjoyed, in retaining the spoils and decreasing the numbers of the Christians, whose prosperity they envied and united to destroy, tends to inflame their malignity, and to render the future peace of this country most insecure. It is time England should protect Protestant Christians from the combination of Turk, Greek, and Romish evildoers.

ROMISH EFFORTS IN BULGARIA.

The Rev. Mr. Morse writes from Adrianople that the Jesuits are again carrying forward a most active propaganda amongst the Bulgarian community of the Greek faith. Despite the failure of their first attempt, when the bishop whom the Pope had so pompously consecrated at Rome recanted to his original Greek profession, the Jesuits have now boasted that thirty villages have been enrolled as Greek Catholics, and 5,000 houses in Adrianople and suburbs. Through their influence two priests, a secular agent, and a strong firman from the Turkish Government has been secured; the Government looking with favour on the Romish (or French) movement, in hopes of preventing the Bulgarians from emigrating to the Crimea, at the instigation of Russia, in the place of the Tartars. A new Propaganda Society has been formed at Rome, to effect the union of the Eastern with the Western Churches. The Catholic paper entitled The Bulgarian has been set up again, under its auspices. The Pope, also, has issued a bull, asserting that all those uniting with the Catholic Church in the East may retain their own customs and regulations.

ALEPPO STATION.

The Armenians are more accessible. The Bible is in many houses, and is much read; and many admit the truth to be with the Protestants. The great obstacle to accessions to our numbers is in the fact "that the chief Armenians strive to retain all in the old Church, by encouraging hopes of changes among themselves." The native Church is about to elect a pastor and assume his support.

BOSTON, UNITED STATES.

The financial resources of the Board will require this year, more than last, the liberal sympathies of British Christians.

MOHAMMEDAN MOSQUES AND THE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTIONS ATTACHED TO THEM.

—, Syria.

LEARNED MEN AMONG THE ARABS.

If we remember that Mohammedanism is the religion professed by a people who for several centuries were not only the most powerful nation of the world, but had monopolised nearly all the learning and civilisation of their times, we shall be prepared to form some estimate of the provision which it made for education, and for raising an innumerable host of men learned in all the branches of their religion and in all the branches of science which were then known. From the simple point of view that the number of original MSS. left by those men of past ages is immense, and the field of literature which they cover is correspondingly extensive, one is astounded at the degree of learning which has been diffused in the East. These products of literary labour are, with very few and unimportant exceptions, wholly identified with the name of Mohammedanism, and they are generally characterised by a clear, methodical, logical, and acute turn of mind.

The subject gains an additional point of interest from the fact that Islamism itself is indebted, in no small measure, to the reflex action of the learning which it encouraged. The Koran was written in the golden age of the Arabic language; and as this magnificent language became corrupted in the course of time, that book, whose eloquence and classical purity have so strange a charm to every Moslem mind, would have long ago lost its power, were it not for the services of learning which was used for finding out and explaining its meanings. The treasure so highly prized seemed all but inexhaustible; and the accumulated learning of more than a thousand years has been spent in giving the Mohammedan religion that venerable and learned position which it occupies among its followers. To admit, however, all the pretensions of the Moslems on this subject would be absurd. For the Koran, with all the extreme views which the Mohammedans hold as to its literary merit, is not a book which can well bear all the research and learned study of ten centuries. And yet we cannot deny that during those long ages it was the treasure-house around which all the learning of the East gathered itself, either for material or illustration. While, therefore, the influences which this book has exercised on the learning and literature of the Arabs have been immense, no less so have been the reflex and multifarious services which it has gained from those whom it claims as its avowed debtors.

Without entering into a controversy with the Mohammedans as to the precise merits of the case, the single point which may be safely deduced from the preceding observations is, that for that vast assembly of learned men, many of whom were unquestionably possessed of real erudition, and for those long ages of civilisation and learning among the Arab race, there must have been some adequate provision in the way of education—some means commensurate with the results which cannot be questioned, whatever the opinion may be as to the nature and value of the learning and literature of the Mohammedans.

The solution of the question lies in the fact that the whole Moslem world, where the Arabic language is spoken, teemed with mosques and colleges. From Bagdad to Cordova—the two confines where the Mohammedan religion has established itself—every city could count them by hundreds, and every town by tens, if not by scores. Nor were the benefits of education circumscribed to cities and towns: humble villagers sought these institutions, and received there instruction gratuitously, and often with it pecuniary help, which the munificent endowments of these colleges enabled them to bestow. A number of their learned men who attained the highest eminence were of this humble origin.

THE MOSQUE AND THE COLLEGE CONJOINED.

From time immemorial—probably from the earliest times of Abbassides—the mosques and colleges have been conjoined together. The exception takes place when the mosques are small and its endowments insufficient to meet the salaries of the professors. Sometimes the college is a detached building, but there is always within the premises a hall for public worship, which serves the purposes of a mosque. Generally, however, the two establishments are joined together. The idea, therefore, that all learning, whether secular or religious, must minister to the welfare of religion, seems to have been early entertained by men who could easily trace their ancestry to the tribes of Arabia. To the strong secular arm of a government fanatically zealous of its Islamism, were added all the means and appliances and facilities which sagacity could point out, for encouraging its public worship, and exacting homage to its external enactments; and to all this was added a system of education almost co-extensive with the numberless religious establishments which sprang all over the land more thickly than any Christian country is covered with churches and chapels. In searching, therefore, for the elements of power in the Mohammedan system during its past ages, we have a key to that effect in the interesting group of facts which we have indicated; and it should not be forgotten that it is not to the secular arm alone, nor to the full provision which Mohammedanism made for its worship and establishment among the public, that it owes all its consolidated power, but that no small or mean share is to be attributed to the subservient services of education and learning. It is certainly observable—and the observation is a highly serviceable one—that Mohammedanism, as a religious power, began to languish as soon as the cause of its learning began also to languish.

A MOSQUE DESCRIBED.

The two institutions being incorporated together, it is difficult to speak of the one without speaking of the other. We shall therefore take one mosque as a specimen of the whole, and give a general description of the establishment, of its order, and of the offices held in it. And first as regards its general architecture. The material of the building is generally the best that can be obtained in the place—almost always of stone finely cut. The building consists of a number of rooms, arranged in the form of a square, with a colonnade running around, and facing the court, not surrounding the building, as in ancient temples. This colonnade, or arched porches, supported on columns of polished stone, is very useful, both in winter and summer, for making the passage to the rooms very comfortable, and the rooms themselves no less so. They form, also, splendid walks; but whether it be in the climate, or in the race, it is certain that neither the students nor the worshippers make much use of them for this purpose. The vast court is paved, and has in the centre an open cistern, or reservoir of running water, for the ablutions of the worshippers. The rooms are small and square, and are occupied by the professors, the other officials of the establishment, and the students. In the southern part of the building there is always a very large hall, called the south hall, in which public worship is held. It is generally oblong, very simply furnished, with clean mats, and sometimes with carpets, and has but two observable features—a pulpit and a niche in the southern wall. The pulpit is of the simplest construction, and of the usual form, gained by a good number of steps, and surmounted by a small wooden cupola. To the niche we shall refer again when we come to speak of the mode of conducting public prayers. The south hall is also used, at the option of the professors, for their lectures.

OFFICERS OF THE MOSQUE.

As regards the different office-bearers who hold place in the establishment, there is, first, a President, who has the general supervision of the premises, and who manages the financial department. When this latter is in the hands of the Government, his office becomes limited to see that general order, in accordance with the rules of the mosque, is kept, and that the professors, the students, and the menial officials employed in the services of the institution, are doing their respective duties. In case of difference, the point at issue should, according to the old régime, be referred to and settled by the Kadi, who is considered to be the authoritative exponent of the original code of the testator. Latterly, the Government has taken up the matter into its own hands, and appointed officers to whose custody are committed the revenue and disbursements of the endowments (Awkaf).

Every mosque has one or more Imams, whose duty is to lead the people in public prayer. At the appointed hours the Muezzin, of whom in every large mosque there are several, calls the people to prayers. Assembled in the south hall, they stand in rows behind the Imam, facing the Caaba in Mecca. The Imam stands in the niche and repeats the prayers—called inflections—audibly, while the people follow him secretly throughout the whole performance. As these prayers are fixed and unchangeable, except in one or two minor places, it is not necessarily required that the Imam be a learned man; but their rules demand that he should be pious and intelligent, and that his pronunciation of the words of prayer be distinct and correct.

The duties of the Lecturer (or orator) are to conduct the service every Friday noon. Friday is the sacred day of the Mohamedans, and the most important prayer on that day is that of noon. At the conclusion of the cries of the Muezzin, the lecturer takes his stand in the pulpit of the south hall, and begins the service with a short prayer. He then reads a written lecture, from which part of the service he takes his name, and concludes with prayer for the reigning Sultan, for himself, and for all believers. Prayer among the Mohamedans, when it really falls within the scope of what is commonly known as such, is expressed in general terms, and has chiefly reference to supplications for mercy, pardon, guidance, and favour. No allusion is ever made to sanctification, or the extension of religion among men; and an air of formality and self-righteousness characterises the whole proceedings. If mercy is ever felt to be needed, the meritorious act of prayer is supposed to render the sinner worthy of it. The lecturer's office is considered to be higher than that of the Imam, and he takes the precedence of the latter on Fridays. But as he may, and indeed as he generally does, borrow his orations from the writings of others, he is not regarded as a necessarily learned man.

The lecturo concludes just as the time for the mid-day prayers has come. These consist of two inflections, and are led by the lecturer, who descends from the pulpit, and takes his position in the niche facing the south, while the worshippers stand in rows behind him. At the conclusion of the prayers, the lecturer retires and gives place to the preacher.

The Preacher receives his appointment from the Government, or from the trustees of the mosque; but it is at his option to nominate the days on which he shall preach. On these days, and generally in the afternoon, a high chair is placed for his use in the hall, from which he delivers his discourse in the sitting posture. The sermon is always extempore, and is founded on a passage from the Koran, or on one of their many traditions. The exposition is sometimes exegetical, sometimes practical. As the hearing of the sermon is not considered obligatory, the number of the audience will depend upon the popularity of the preacher. The preacher is generally one of the professors in the mosque, and as some of them are known to be learned men, it is possible that they may be good preachers; but no infidel is ever allowed to hear their sermons or attend their prayers.

The Professors, of whom every large mosque has several, come at appointed hours, and give their lectures, either in their own rooms or in the large hall. If in the latter, an agreement among themselves as to the hour secures to them its use, or at least a part of it. Every professor begins his duties with the performance of the set prayer of the hour. When he concludes, if he teaches in the hall, a servant spreads a carpet for him to sit on, and places a low desk before him, on which the professor places the book from which he teaches. The pupils who attach themselves to him sit and listen, while he expounds the principles of the branch of study which he teaches, taking the words of the book before him as the text suggestive of the ideas which he advances. The method of instruction more generally adopted is that of familiar exposition; but if the professor be a distinguished man, the lectures are worthy of the name, and are often truly learned. It depends upon the regulations of the testator whether each professor is to teach a specified branch, or to be guided by his own choice. Generally, however, every professor goes through a consecutive course of several branches. All the professors hold the same rank; but their salaries, their reputation, and their popularity, depend partly upon the favour they may have with men in office, and partly upon their individual talents and abilities. A professor in one mosque may hold office in another.

The office of professorship is held either from the legatees of the testator, or from the Government, if this has fallen into its hands. When a professor dies, the precedence of his successorship is always given to one of his sons, if competent. If the children are young, a professor holds the office pro tempore, dividing the salary with the family of the deceased, until time shows that none of the sons is competent to succeed to the office of his father. When the deceased leaves no children, or leaves such as are unworthy of the place, a candidate presents himself before the Kadi, or Government, as the case may be: the Kadi, if satisfied with the testimonials of his competency, refers the matter to the provincial council of the city. After another examination, the application is favourably reported to a committee in Constantinople, who represent it to the Sultan. When the financial department of a mosque is in the hands of the Government, the professors always hold their office by a royal patent, and receive their salaries from an officer who is entrusted with the affairs of endowments.

THE LIBRARY, THE STUDENTS, AND THE PROFESSORS.

No college is considered complete without a Library, which is obtained either by original endowments or by special gift subsequently. Sometimes the trustee or trustees add to the collection with the money of the institution. In some mosques they are very large, consisting of over 5,000 volumes, and are often extremely valuable. Access to the books depends wholly on the rules laid down by the donor. Their use is generally confined to the students. Every library has a special room and a librarian, who has a catalogue of all the books. When the endowment falls into the hands of the Government, a copy of the catalogue is forwarded to Constantinople, where it is inscribed in a special book. Moreover, each book has the seal of the college on several of its pages. Notwithstanding, however, all these precautions, very little care is taken of them, and they are very often stolen or lost.

The Students may be divided into two classes—such as reside in the college, and such as come only at the hours of instruction. The majority by far belong to the latter class. The students who live on the premises of the institution have each a room free of rent, and often have a monthly allowance not exceeding five shillings. The tuition is always and wholly gratuitous to all. The rules respecting the residence of the students vary in different colleges. In some they are not allowed to absent themselves without permission; in others they have a general permission to go out on necessary business, and others allow married men to visit their families twice a week. The same relation exists in the East between the professors and students which obtains in Europe—the same general disposition to a mutual attachment, and the same admiration and respect which is naturally and sincerely felt by the scholar towards his teacher.

In the prosecution of their studies the students have no definitely - prescribed curriculum which they are required to go through. It is, therefore, generally left to themselves to choose between the different branches which are taught, or to study them all. Such as aim to become professors or eminently-learned men study long all the important branches. One of the professors in this city was for twelve years a student at the mosque El Azhar, in Egypt, which is the best-conducted and largest Oriental seminary of learning in the East. Nor do they, after finishing their studies, pass an examination, or take anything like a degree or diploma. At one time, however, it appears that something of the kind used to take place; but only a few of the oldest and best professors have now written testimonials, called permits, signed by the men with whom they studied. The professors by right, and the graduates, either by right or by courtesy, are always titled Sheikh, a word which in its primary sense means an old man, then a man entitled to respect, a learned man, a doctor. The last is the signification commonly attached to it among the Mohammedans when applied to literary men; but it should not be confounded with the title of feudal chiefs, chiefs of villages, &c. The offices which the students who have finished their studies generally fill range from the duties of the Mufti — the highest literary position among the Mohammedans — to those of a common schoolmaster or a reader of the Koran. Between these two extremes there are many offices to which the students find their way, either by real merit or by favour. On the whole, most of these offices are not lucrative enough to make them objects of anxious demand, except by those who spring from humble origin, or, as is very common, by the descendants of men who had earned their living by following the same course of literary pursuits. No Christian is ever allowed to receive instruction, on any account, in a Mohammedan college; and it is with some difficulty that he can carry his education privately with a Mohammedan professor who is distinguished for his Oriental learning.

SECULAR LEARNING TAUGHT IN THE COLLEGES.

The Branches of Learning which are taught in these colleges are divided into two great classes, the secular and the religious. Of the former they regard the most important to be, the Arabic Grammar, Rhetoric, Logic, and Prosody; and of the latter, the Articles of Religion, or Theology, and Law, Civil and Religious, Traditions, and the Interpretation of the Koran. There are others—making the whole number above twenty; but they are of a minor and supplementary character. As a few words on each of the principal branches of Mohammedan learning may be interesting to the English reader, it may be proper just briefly to notice them.

The Arabic Language, spoken by nearly forty millions, and forming the sacred language of a hundred and fifty millions of the human race, is universally admitted to be one of the most ancient, as it is one of the most difficult to learn. To master it well, many years of study are required, and to be a first-rate grammarian is the work of nearly a whole lifetime. The man, therefore, who spends long years of hard study in thoroughly mastering the Arabic has a considerable title to a learned position—not only on account of the intrinsic value of this branch of learning, nor only because thereby is secured the key to the storehouse of Arabic literature, but also because it is one of the most effectual methods among the Easterns for culturing the intellectual powers of man. The clear analytical method pursued in books of Arabic grammar, the logical sequence of its parts, the comprehensive nature of its rules, the lucid interpretation and illustration, and the use of extreme precision in expressing the sense intended, will astonish the man of cultivated intellect who enters this field with the expectation of finding it full of barbarism and confusion. These few observations are sufficient to explain the great pains to which the Arabs gave themselves in constructing the grammar of their difficult language, the well-merited value which they have placed on this branch of their learning, and the important position which they have given it in their educational system.

The Arabic language having in its prose and poetry many nice shades of meaning, and a very large variety of figurative speech, its Rhetoric is an extensive and important branch of study. The ordinary treatise which is commonly used as a textbook on the subject is larger than the well-known lectures of Dr. Blair, but we have seen a manuscript volume on the "Rhetoric and Belles Letters of Poetry" several times the size of the doctor's work. Foreign and impartial critics have made the observation, however, that the Koran having been taken as the infallible standard of style and of the structure of language, some of the rules of rhetoric are made to bend without sufficient reason to its supreme authority. It is noticeable that one branch of this science—eloquence of public speaking—considered by other nations to be very important, formed no subject of study among the rhetoricians of the Arabic language. It was the philosophical structure of language, the perspicuity, accuracy, and elegance of style, the nice shades of sense involved in the construction of sentences, and the extensive variety of metaphor with which their language abounds, that they essayed to study and expound in their writings. Of the composition of a discourse, of delivery, of elocution, and of emphasis, they either had no idea, or they combated such an idea on the ground that a well-cultured mind, under the guidance of nature and good taste, would feel itself independent of artificial rules. Nor have they had those special circumstances in civil government and in the courts of law which at all times have been found indispensably necessary to call forth and develop the highest forms of public speaking. In their pulpits, and on more common occasions, natural oratory is probably all that they have.

To the Logic of the ancients the Arabs have probably added nothing new, although it has been a common and favourite study among them. The preliminary parts of the science treat of the definition of its technical terms, and the principal part of the nature, structure, and kinds of propositions and syllogisms; and perhaps a last chapter is added on sophism. It retains among them all the dry scientific forms and all the scholastic rigidity of the three centuries which preceded the era of the reformation of religion and letters in Europe. Logic, in both the East and West during those ages, was, we believe, a transcript of the writings of Aristotle; but it is not unlikely that the Westerns borrowed from the Mohammedans that classified form to which the latter had reduced it, or on which they had improved. Of the more comprehensive nature of the logic of modern times, and of the cognate science of metaphysics, they are ignorant. On the latter they have no systematic work, although metaphysical questions and disquisitions and a metaphysical spirit are not wanting in their writings. This science was either not to be easily gleaned from the writings of the ancients, or it appeared to them too abstruse in its nature and too dangerous in its religious tendencies to form safe ground on which to proceed.

The Prosody of Arabic poetry is a well-constructed and full science; and as the Arabs have cultivated the Muses to a very extraordinary extent, it is with them an important and favourite study. On the character of Arabic poetry we hesitate to say anything, further than to mention the fact, that many of its pieces are generally highly admired by those who fully understand them; for though there is not in the Arabic language any fine epic poem, the general beauties of its poetry are not few, nor of an inferior order. Algebra is believed to have been invented by the Arabs, but it does not appear that many of them have applied themselves to its study. Arithmetic, algebra, and geometry, with the other higher branches of the mathematics, are at present almost unknown among the Mohammedans. In astronomy they retain the ancient planetary system; but some of them attained a respectable degree in this department of science, as appears from their calculations and tables for eclipses. Astrology does not seem to have prevailed in the East more than it did at one time in the West.

SACRED LEARNING.

The Religious Branches of their learning have already been enumerated. The articles of religion, or Theology, is treated by them in two different ways: one is an examination of the articles of their faith in reference to the language of the Koran and tradition, and the other is an attempt to illustrate and prove the elementary principles of religion on a natural or metaphysical ground. On Polemic Theology one finds now and then an elaborate work. Law among the Mohammedans, as among the Jews, embraces civil jurisprudence and the ceremonial ordinances of religion. On the latter branch of the law, the Mohammedan doctors have been more punctilious in meeting all hypothetical cases relative to the rites and ordinances of their religion than the casuists of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, in their system of cases of conscience. The branch of Traditions is a truly formidable study, and this for two reasons: First, because it took the best scholars a good number of centuries before they were able to decide which had and which had not a sufficient amount of historical proof for their introduction into, or rejection from, the code of the Mohammedan faith; and secondly, because the number is prodigiously large—thirty thousand being the number of the accredited traditions, if we mistake not. The Interpretation of the Koran embraces, also, the interpretation of traditions, and has reference to a minute and critical investigation of the meaning of the words, allusions, and doctrines involved in these standards of their religion. Mohammedanism is the great "Mystery of Iniquity" in the East, as Popery is in the West; and it is remarkable that their simultaneous rise is an unquestionable point of history, as their simultaneous fall is the testimony of inspired prophecy.

ORIGIN OF THE COLLEGES.

These religious and educational establishments owe their origin chiefly to the munificent endowments of kings, who probably gave the first impulse to governors and rich people. Two motives, wholly different in character, actuated the donors—the highly meritorious nature of the act, and family interests. On the former nothing more need be said than that it obtained with many, especially in the earlier days of Islamism, when the impulse to learning was very great, when the Abbassides in the East, and their agents and successors in Spain, encouraged by their example such gifts with all the magnificent liberality which they could then so well bestow, when the Khalifs took the liveliest interest in patronising and promoting learning, and when the primitive, blind honesty and fidelity to the cause of their religion had not declined. On the second, a word of explanation is necessary. As those palmy ages of Mohammedan power and fidelity to its original traditions and policy passed away—as the Turkish rule overspread the empire, and Turkish vices and corruption and extortion were introduced—many of the old, rich families could keep their large estates to their posterity from foreign violence only by this new expedient of endowing a mosque or college, and vesting the wardship in their descendants. Endowments made in such bad faith cannot be expected to hold out long. The claims of these old families, and the rapacity of avacious governors, left in time but little of the original endowments; and that little has now passed into the hands of the Government.

FALL OF MOHAMMEDAN LEARNING.

Many of the mosques still stand, and are used for the purposes of prayer, but of the collegiate institutions once attached to them very little is left. The endowments have disappeared. The Government does not encourage learning—at least not the learning of the old Moslem school. Many of the professors are negligent of their duties, and very few of them are now of real eminence in their profession. The Moslem youth are bent on the more active duties of life. Under these circumstances, learning is fast disappearing from among them; and the day is fast coming, when, judging from present appearances, their learning and their colleges will belong to the past history of Mohammedanism. In fact, they already belong to it. To thousands of dilapidated educational establishments pious Moslems look up now with dismay, and in the set expression of submission, so frequently represented in the Koran, say, "There is no might nor strength but in God!"

And in the fall of Mohammedan learning, and of Mohammedan intolerance, and of Mohammedan power, Divine Providence has given Mohammedanism its death-blow, has forced its weapons from its hands, and left it a helpless captive. Let not the facts of the case, however, be misunderstood: Mohammedanism is not yet dead. The giant who has lived nearly thirteen hundred years does not die in a day. Nor can he die without struggles commensurate with that terrible strength which made him at one time the dread and scourge of the world. He is dying; but in his death-throes, as in the pulsations of his life, he desolates many a home, and sends a thrill of horror to the most distant hearths of Christendom.

DUTY OF CHRISTIANS.

When Providence opens a door that has been long closed, and leads the way, it is the duty of the Church to follow. The changes taking place among the Mohammedans seem to be of this character. The time when Christianity may put forth all its aggressive powers against the Mohammedan religion has not, perhaps, fully come. It is not safe, and perhaps not wise, to make the attempt just at present. But it is the duty of the Church of Christ to hold herself in a prayerful and expectant attitude, in view of that day which does not appear to be far distant. The question now is, Can Christians do anything towards that object at this time? We believe they can, and in the following way: Let Protestant Christendom rear a college of a very high order in Syria, which is the central and most promising country of the Arab race; let it be thoroughly imbued with the principles of the Gospel; let its chairs be filled by competent men; let its instructions be of the most valuable and attractive character, and it is not difficult to foresee that such an institution, with the blessing of God, will have a beneficial and lasting influence upon all the Arabic-speaking race. On the ruins of the Mohammedan colleges let Christianity rear a college of her own, and the benefits which will accrue to the labours of her missionaries in the East will be incalculably great.

JAPAN.

MORAL CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE: MISSIONARY AGENCIES AND PROSPECTS.

Nagasaki, June 5, 1862.

Since last writing to you, circumstances have induced me to visit Japan. A few words respecting the prospects of Christianity in this country will, I have no doubt, be acceptable to many of your readers.

One cannot but feel interested in a land which has so much to recommend it to our attention. It has stood alone in its isolation from other countries during the bygone centuries of its history, but at length the period has arrived when this exclusive policy must be abandoned for principles more liberal and more in consistence with the advanced age in which we live. By recent treaties foreigners are now admitted to various parts of the empire; and although the high conservative party look upon the intrusion of foreigners with suspicion, and as a sign of national degeneracy, the great body of the people are well pleased with the present order of things.

The scenery of Japan is very fine, oftentimes grand. Its high ranges of hills, stretching away into the distance as far as the eye can reach, present a very favourable contrast to the low and marshy plains around Shanghai. What materially tends to increase the effect is the high state of cultivation to which the sides of the mountains have been brought. Every available spot, even to the very tops of the mountains, has been seized upon, and been brought under the control of the cultivator. The consequence is, the hills are beautifully marked by a succession of terraces, presenting the appearance of beautiful gardens.

Whilst Nature, however, assumes here her loveliest forms, man, instead of being elevated by the grandeurs around him, has sunk into the very lowest depths of moral degradation. The representations of modern writers in reference to the Japanese, as a nation, are, in the majority of cases, too highly coloured. The impressions left by them on the mind of the reader are more favourable than a personal investigation would justify. Struck by the ingenuity of the people in many matters, and their readiness to adopt the improvements which foreigners have made in the arts and sciences, these writers have overlooked, or at least have endeavoured to modify, the fact that a fearful state of immorality prevails throughout the length and breadth of the land. There appears to be an utter absence of modesty, and of the decencies of ordinary life, which are everywhere to be found, even amongst the most uncivilised communities.

The sadness of the spectacle, however, is increased by the thought that the influence of the Gospel may not at present be brought to bear upon these degraded masses. In the recent treaties the Japanese could not be induced to abolish the law prohibiting Christianity. The English treaty stipulates that "British subjects in Japan shall be allowed the free exercise of their religion, and for this purpose shall have the right to erect suitable places of worship." By this article no permission is given to the missionary to preach the Gospel, inasmuch as the old law denouncing death against those who embrace Christianity is still in force. The American treaty, in addition to the above article, has a clause to the effect that "the American and Japanese shall not do anything that may be calculated to excite religious animosity." This effectually prevents any American missionary from engaging in evangelistic labours, as all such might be said "to excite religious animosity."

There are now two missionaries in Nagasaki—the Rev. Mr. Verbeck, of the American Dutch Reformed Church; and the Rev. Mr. Williams, of the American Episcopal Church. They are engaged in the study of the language, ready to take advantage of any opportunity which Providence may present to them. The fierce and bitter hatred which existed in former days against Christianity has long since subsided. The common people, indeed, have no conception of what is meant by Christianity, so thoroughly has the Government eradicated all traces of it out of the country. It is a singular fact, and one which illustrates the absolute character of the Government, that thousands of Japanese were once martyrs for a faith which is now entirely obliterated from the traditions of the people.

There is every reason to believe that when all restrictive laws have been abolished, and an opportunity has been given to declare plainly that the aims and tendencies of the Gospel are not political, but spiritual, Christianity will find no more difficulty in making its way in this land than has been experienced in any other heathen country. Many of the Japanese have received copies of the Bible, which there is every reason to believe they read. The presence, too, of missionaries will not be without effect. Although they may not directly speak of Christ, their lives will be an indirect testimony to the nature of Christianity; which, unfortunately, will be rendered much more striking by the very godless and irreligious lives which foreigners are accustomed to lead here.

It seems an unfortunate circumstance that the Japanese should first have become acquainted with Christianity through the medium of the Church of Rome. Not merely in Western countries has her presence blighted religious feelings and stopped the growth of true piety; in Eastern lands also the poison which she emitted centuries ago still operates to the detriment of Christ's Church. The prospect then of Christianising this people is still very dark. The difficulty lies not so much with the people as with the Government. Let but the Government remove its restrictions, and the inherent power of God's truth will overcome the depravity which so fearfully abounds.

CENTRAL AFRICA.

DR. LIVINGSTONE AND THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY MISSION.

A letter has been received from Dr. Livingstone, dated from the River Shire, at the commencement of the year, which confirms the accounts previously received of the difficulties which have been encountered by the agents of the Oxford and Cambridge Mission, and giving some additional details of events which had occurred previous to the death of Bishop Mackenzie. The doctor also gives some account of his plans for the future. The letter, of which we subjoin the substance, was addressed to the Rev. Wm. Monk, of Cambridge:—

"It was very annoying," he writes, "to find that the people of Tette had come along the path followed by Dr. Kirk along the Shire to that village, and set up an extended system of slave-hunting in the very country to which the mission had come. A tribe called Ajawa had been employed to attack the Manganja villages, kill the men, and sell the women and children to the Portuguese for a mere trifle in calico. Four parties, with about 140 captives, fell into our hands, and were handed over to the bishop as a beginning to his flock. They were chiefly women and children. The paramount chief, instead of aiding his subjects, kindly helped the slave-hunters across the Shire. We found that the whole [Manganja] nation were fleeing, and hoping to stop this and the effusion of blood, went to hold a parley with the Ajawa. Unfortunately, we came to them when in the act of burning three villages. The bishop then offered up a fervent prayer, and with the accents of that prayer we could distinctly hear the wail for the dead, and the shrill screams for victory. As we advanced to their villages our assurances that we came peaceably were nullified by some Manganja followers calling out, "Our Chibisa [chief] has come;" and very unfortunately, though I heard it distinctly, it did not strike the mind till afterwards, that we were thereby deprived of the protection of our English name. They attacked us on all sides with poisoned arrows and four muskets, and I feel very sure that the latter were handled by Portuguese slaves. We retired slowly from the village, but this only made them bolder; they came within fifty yards of us, and it was only by recourse to our firearms that we avoided all becoming food for the vultures. I am sorry that it was necessary, for it was the first hostile encounter I have had in Africa. Had I anticipated an attack, I should have used fair words and presents first. We are, however, in the slave market. We were twice robbed in the sphere of an Arab dhow's slaving operations, about half-way up Lake Nyassa—the first loss by robbers I have sustained in the continent. Slaving is the parent of every other vice."

At this point the doctor left the missionaries, and some months afterwards

Bishop Mackenzie and Mr. Burrup died, under the painful circumstances stated last month. Meanwhile Dr. Livingstone proceeded to Lake Nyassa (upwards of 200 miles in length), by way of the Upper Shire, in a boat which was exposed to no small hazard from "terrific rollers, with wall-like sides and hairy heads, breaking in from seven to fourteen fathoms." A large population inhabit the shores of the lake. Here is the doctor's noble project with respect to them :—

The people were civil—no dues were levied or fines demanded; but slaving is the only trade. Colonel Rigby, our Consul at Zanzibar, says, in a letter to Sir George Grey, that 19,000 slaves pass through the Custom-house there annually—all, or nearly all, from Nyassa or Shire; and he adds: "If it should ever be possible to place a steamer on Lake Nyassa it will cut off the chief supply of slaves to the east coast." Without knowing that gentleman's opinion, we have ordered a steamer from Glasgow, in twenty-four parts, which we hope to carry past the Cataracts as our next work. We expect her soon, and I shall not pen a syllable to you or any one else till it is accomplished. I pray to Him in whose hand are "our times" to permit me to accomplish this great service. Then a path to the sea by Rovuma, or some river in the dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar, for we must have an outlet to the sea uncontrolled by the Portuguese. Fancy the folly of our allies; the Government builds a post at the mouth of the Shire, to be enriched by cotton dues, while the people of Tette do all in their power to depopulate the country from which the cotton is to come. If we have our own outlet, the cotton field, now 400 miles long, will be prolonged far to the north and west, and our own English honest poor may live on the islands and become blessings to Africa, our own sweet home, and to themselves. These are my hopes, and it ought to be borne in mind that my expedition should be dated only from the possession of the Pioneer. We were forced to return by want of food, when, as we have reason to believe, we were in sight of the dark mountain masses in which Lake Nyassa ends.

A tribe of Zulus, originally from the south, had made terrible havoc among the Lake people. We don't know why, as we received only one-sided statements, and never form an opinion on that sort of evidence; but human skeletons and putrid bodies of the slain strewed the shores—"man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn." In view of this tribe wandering up so far, it strikes me that the more work Christian people attempt the more their Master gives them to perform. The bishop at the Cape, with his Kaffir College, is probably fitting missionaries to labour much nearer the equator than he ever contemplated. I always rejoice to hear of efforts to spread our blessed religion, no matter by whom, for I am sure that He who is head over all things to His Church condescends to accept the hearty, though often feeble, offering of His people, and will guide all to a glorious consummation. This college seems an admirable institution.

Frequent storms rendered it unadvisable for us to attempt crossing to find out all about the matter for ourselves. It was the first time I ever was forced back without accomplishing what I had to do; but had I time to tell you all, you would see that further progress might have proved fatal to us. We returned to the uppermost cataract, slung our boat to a shady tree, and walked home, having in three months travelled, in going and coming, six hundred miles. Anything "anent" a growing interest in the mission of the Church will be always welcome; systematic efforts to diffuse information ought to be made. Without being particularly prone to grumble, I think there is room for a growl at the missionaries enlisting for three or five years only. It is probably from want of knowledge of missionary work in Africa; very few leave Africa without wishing to come back again; so it may all turn out right at last. I hear that the Free Church of Scotland contemplates a mission out here, and the United Free Methodists are sending another mission under Dr. Krapf to the east coast. There is room for all and for more than will ever come.

Dr. Livingstone, writing some months later, after he had learned that Bishop Mackenzie had died, says: "I shall not swerve one hair's-breadth from my work, and trust that the supporters of the mission at home will not fail either. Our good and loveable bishop has not lived in vain." The last news from the mission was of a less discouraging character. The Manganja were friendly, and even the hostile Ajawa had peacefully requested permission to reside near the station, while both appeared to be impressed by the avowed antagonism of the missionaries to the slave-trade.

MISSIONS OF THE BRITISH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES.—A Scottish correspondent, by whose request we inserted, in our July number, a table forwarded by him of the sums raised by the British Presbyterian Churches, for missionary purposes, has, we find, under-stated the amount of the missionary contributions of the Established and the Free Churches of Scotland. The Established Church raised, we are informed, alone, during the last financial year, the sum of 44,308*l*. The missionary income of the Free Church appears to have amounted to 49,278*l*. Of course, both the home and foreign missions of the two churches are included in this statement.

A PROTESTANT HOLIDAY IN ITALY.—The Vaudois have appointed one day—the 15th of August—for a general gathering, a camp-meeting, a picnic, the happy day, par excellence, in the twelvemonth. The Times Turin Correspondent has taken part in this festival for the present year, and sends an interesting account of the proceedings, dated Pinerolo, August 16. He writes: "The spot appointed for the fête is changed every year, and choice is made of a lonely ground, in the free air, away from the haunts of men, far, far up in the mountains. This year the faithful were to meet at the Piani, in the district of Prarostino, and we had from two hours and a-half to three hours to climb." He therefore rose at three in the morning, and accompanied by a party of Vaudois, proceeded on his way. After describing the earlier stages of the journey, he goes on to say that, as they walked, "cultivation and habitation gradually forsook us; meadows widened into pastures, woods took the place of vineyards, and so the goal was reached—a verdant glade, with the finest, freshest, densest grass we had ever seen, with tufts and patches of young chesnut groves, on a long, steep, slippery slope, somewhat about 2,000 feet above the plain; the plain spreading before us like a billiard-table, with the rows of trees—mulberry-trees—dotting its surface, its streams winding across the level, and its towns and hamlets glittering in the sun; the whole bathed in thin haze, bearing no faint resemblance to a vast sheet of water, with the Turin hills about forty miles off, barring the view like a coast to the sea, and the dome of Superga doing duty as a beacon on the top-most summit. We were early on the spot, but hardly the earliest. Parties of holiday-makers were already in possession of the most eligible ground under shady trees, near springs of water, where they had roared kitchens, lighted fires, set pots boiling, peeled potatoes, and plucked fowls. It was scarcely seven in the morning, but bating the coffee, none of us had broken fast, and mountain air sharpens appetite. After this hurried morning repast we all crowded to the place of meeting, where a rustic platform had been erected—a few boards resting on the trunks of chestnut-trees, the foliage of which spread like a beautiful canopy over this improvised pulpit. On the platform were Messrs. Bert and Meille, the two Turin pastors, with about half-a-score of ministers from other parishes. On their left was an enclosure for the choir—above 100 singers; all round no less than 2,000 men, women, and children, thronging together on the green, formed the congregation. The services of the day opened with an extempore prayer by M. Meille; after which, and after the singing of a hymn written for the occasion, M. Bert delivered a long speech in commemoration of the virtues and of the useful career of General Beckwith, the benefactor, and truly the father of the Waldenses. After the morning service the audience broke up at noon, and spread about the country and under the woods to cook and eat their dinners. There was then an afternoon meeting, with more sermons and hymns, but in the Italian language, as the morning service had been held in French, and towards sunset the holiday-makers began their descent in their various directions, with their pastors at their head, with song and mirth, with the contentment at heart of men who looked upon the festive day no less as a time for rendering honour and thanks to the Deity than as an occasion for hearty, harmless rejoicing, mutual goodwill and love between man and man."

A BARMEN MISSIONARY writes us from Chota Nagpore, under date of July 4, 1862, as follows: "About the state and progress of our mission we have every reason to be satisfied. Like the isolated position of Chota Nagpore by nature, the work of God here may be thus considered too. Remote from the doings of other denominations, we happily experience not the distressing events which bring other missions so often into contact. The number of baptized, from the time of our first converts, in 1850, up to this date, amounts to 2,750. In this year only, from the 1st January till last Sunday, have been added to our congregation by holy baptism above 700. At the monthly celebration of the Lord's Supper there are communicants regularly to the number of from 120 to 150. We have built this year another station at Hazaoibagh, and a native pastoral out-station amongst our Christians in this district, which has brought our mission fund at so low an ebb, that supplies are greatly needed."

MISSIONARY WORK IN PATAGONIA.—The Rev. G. Pakenham Despard publishes translations of letters received from Mr. John Friedrich Hunziker, catechist of the South American Missionary Society. Writing from Sandy Point, at the close of last year, the catechist describes how, attended by a native, he followed the Indians from one encampment to another: "We had very bad weather the first week of our wandering life, and our track was very muddy. The 17th August we arrived at the Indian tribe, and on the northern bank of the river Gallego. The Indians felt great joy when they saw us come up. Those men who were at home in their tents came out to meet us on horseback. When we got into the encampment all the women assembled, and began to sing in a very extraordinary manner, to honour our arrival among them. When we set up our tent we were surrounded by a multitude of Indians, who regarded us and our tent with great curiosity. Whilst with the Indians we were in thirty encampments. The constant wandering about increased the difficulty of our mission work very much. The Indians have treated us with friendship the whole time, and have never given us one bad word. The poor Indians know not yet with whom we speak when we pray, and our devotional exercises can they not comprehend, and we have not yet words enough to give information of that Saviour who died even for them. I can make myself understood in the Patagonian language a little, but cannot yet follow in a conversation. Our Patagonian vocabulary has now about 1,000 words. We shall arrange it in the days we have to spend here. The language is extremely difficult to learn. The Indians are extremely indolent to think in order to get words from them. At the beginning of our wanderings we had sometimes very severe cold. Once we had 18 degs. Fahrenheit in our tent. We had often of an afternoon to remove the snow for a long space away before we could pitch our tent. Often we had to set up our tent upon very soft ground, and then to spread our carpet, so our bed was soft enough and we slept very sound. We lived this time mostly on guanaco and ostrich-flesh; now and then horse-flesh for a dainty. We were always sound and well on this food." In another letter, dated Cranmer, March 11, 1862, the catechist writes: "We shall be forced to remain here some time, till we can go to Santa Cruz, which is the most suitable place for a mission station. — J. Friedrich Hunziker."

DR. KALISCH'S HEBREW GRAMMAR.

A Hebrew Grammar, with Exercises. By M. M. KALISCH, Ph.D., M.A. In Two Parts. Part I. The Outlines of the Language, with Exercises, being a Practical Introduction to the Study of Hebrew. London: Longman, Green, Longman, and Roberts. 1862.

It would take a considerable amount of time and space to enumerate the works which have been published in this country on Hebrew grammar. Skeleton grammars, primers, reading-books, interlineal translations, analytical praxes—of these we have had enough, and a great deal more than enough; for, with very few exceptions, these productions have been by no means creditable to the scholarship of the nation. Hurwitz's Hebrew Grammar is, by no means, a despicable work; and Lee's "Lectures on Hebrew Grammar" have still more claims to be perused by scholars; while the more recent grammar of Messrs. Mason and Bernard, of Cambridge, notwithstanding its unscholarlike arrangement and tone, may still find favour with some. But even America has excelled us in this department, and the grammars of Moses Stuart and Nordheimer are in advance of any original work executed in this country. Of Germany it is quite unnecessary to say a word, as the grammatical labours of Gesenius, Ewald, and Rödiger, to say nothing of others, are known to all even in this country deserving of the name of Hebrew students, by means of the various translations of their works that have issued from the English and American presses.

We have been much struck with the new grammar by Dr. Kalisch. Despite the high opinion we had formed of his scholarship from reading his commentaries on Genesis and Exodus (although we differ very widely from many of his opinions), we opened the page of his grammar with many misgivings. We feared lest it should exhibit some crotchet, or might propound some new "royal road" to the acquisition of the sacred tongue. We have been agreeably disappointed in our surmises. The first words of his preface were reassuring. "Elaborate treatises," says he, "have been written to prove that Hebrew is an easy language, and manuals have been published professing to teach it in four-and-twenty lessons. We are unable to flatter the student with hopes so pleasing and so gratifying."

Of one thing we are certain, that no original work of equal value on Hebrew grammar has yet appeared in this country. We cannot decide yet whether it is on the whole in advance of any translation, for the first volume now before us contains only the outlines of the language; and, by a judicious arrangement, the exceptional forms and syntactical irregularities are reserved for full consideration in the second part, which is now passing through the press. But if the second part be equal to the first, and if its author explains scientifically some of the facts noted in this volume, so as to bring it up to the present standpoint of Hebrew philology, the work bids fair to be for English scholars the very best grammatical Thesaurus of Hebrew for general use.

We may be permitted here to draw attention to a work but recently published in Germany, of very considerable importance in this department, and which, though not professedly a comparative grammar of the Shemitic languages, is the first attempt at supplying that great desideratum. We allude to the work of the distinguished Hebraist, Dr. Justus Olshausen (who must not be confounded with the well-known New Testament critic, Dr. Hermann Olshausen)—namely, his "Lehrbuch der Hebräischen Sprache" (Braunschweig, 1861).

In a former review of Mr. A. B. Davidson's work on Hebrew accentuation we noted the very general deficiency of Hebrew grammars on that point. Dr. Kalisch's work is a marked exception. Although what he says about the accents does not occupy many pages, considerable information is condensed therein, though the use of Mr. Davidson's little treatise is by no means superseded.

With Dr. Kalisch's explanation of "vav conversive" we are inclined to coincide; but we hope something more may be said by him on this point in his second part, as the objections of Gesenius, who once held the same theory, are worthy of consideration, though they are, in our opinion, by no means insuperable.

Every section in Dr. Kalisch's grammar is followed by exercises. These are so arranged as to combine all the advantage derivable from the use of such works as those of Rev. T. K. Arnold on Greek and Latin, and like that of Dr. Ballantyne on Sanskrit (noticed in our July number), with the study of a systematic grammar. An ordinary amount of energy and zeal will suffice to undergo the necessary exertion imposed by this method. It is disgraceful that so many students, who have obtained a fair acquaintance with Greek and Latin, are satisfied with a mere superficial knowledge of Hebrew, which is of little use, since it is absolutely insufficient for an independent study of the Hebrew Scriptures. Nay, it is often positively injurious; for its possessors generally imagine that they know Hebrew, and sometimes boast that they are in the habit of reading daily a chapter in their Hebrew Bibles—their English Bibles being conveniently at hand. Hence it is that we have a host of new translations of passages of the Old Testament proposed in sermons and in books which a true acquaintance with Hebrew grammar and the genius of that language would cause to be immediately rejected. We trust that the volume of Dr. Kalisch will assist—as it is well-adapted to do—in reforming an evil which has been too long permitted to exist, even in our seats of learning.

Most thoroughly do we coincide with Dr. Kalisch when he says: "It should not be forgotten that the grammar is only the vestibule of the temple which enshrines the literature; that indeed the Scriptures cannot be understood theologically, unless they shall have previously been understood grammatically; an accurate and profound acquaintance with the treasures of the Bible, its facts and ideas, is the aim to which every exertion should tend; the very examples which the student finds in the grammar should make him feel the wealth of information which the Scriptures enclose, and should urge and tempt him to hasten to that rich and almost inexhaustible mine of religious and historical knowledge."

Monthly Retrospect.

HOME.

ON Sunday, the 24th of last month, the Festival of St. Bartholomew, in the ancient Church—Black Bartholomew, as it is more generally designed in our reformed times—the bicentenary of the ejection of 2,000 ministers from the Church of England, was commemorated, with more or less of reference to it, in the pulpit of almost every Dissenting chapel in England. Perhaps we might add, that it had a place in the services of the Established Church as well; for there were many clergymen who referred to the event in their discourses of the day, illustrating it from their own point of view. Our readers are aware that the intention of the Nonconformists to celebrate this remarkable event in our ecclesiastical history has been made public for several months past, and has elicited no small amount of controversy, and that bitterness of tone and alienation of feeling which are the usual attendants of controversy. The 2,000 were ejected because they would not give their unfeigned assent to certain doctrines in the formularies of the Church as to which modern evangelical clergymen—in every other respect their true and legitimate successors—have no scruple. It was natural that Nonconformist lecturers, in dwelling on these points, should point to this difference between the evangelical Churchmen of 1662 and their representatives in 1862; and it was equally natural that the latter should take offence at the freedom, or, as they thought, harshness, with which their conduct and their position were criticised. We have, on former occasions, referred to this controversy, and to the alienation between those whom the course of events had previously been drawing together, that was likely to spring out of it. We have no desire to go back to those questions now. When the controversy was in prospect, we ventured to deprecate it; now that it has taken place, and the worst is over, we congratulate ourselves and our readers on the fact that, so far as we have been able to judge, that worst is not so very bad after all. And we think we can see that the fruits of this strife are not wholly nor even mainly evil; while we may further comfort ourselves with the assurance of God's Word, that in all this world's affairs the evil passes away, while the good is immortal. There are many Churchmen who, if we were to judge from their allusions to this bicentenary, imagine that Dissenters have no other view in its celebration than to annoy the Church. But this is a great mistake. The Congregational celebration has a positive as well as a negative side; all their efforts are not given to pulling down the Church; they have shown that they can appreciate the noble self-sacrifice of the men whom they claim as among the fathers of English Dissent, by subscribing 100,000*l.* as a memorial fund. That sum was named at the outset as the maximum of what they might expect to raise; it has been more than realised, and large progress has been made towards raising a second sum of like amount. The money is to be devoted in large measure to purposes to which even Churchmen cannot fairly object. These are the more special efforts of the Congregational body. The Baptists, we believe, declined to act denominationally in the celebration, holding that the lesson read to posterity by the 2,000 was for the Church at large, and not for a sect ; but they have thrown their energies mainly into the Bartholomew United Committee, represented equally by Independents and Baptists, whose main object is to circulate publications bearing on the controversies of the period. The English Presbyterians—who would have a better title than any of the others to term themselves heirs to the victims of the ejection, were it not that so many of the old English Presbyterians became soon afterwards tainted with heresy, and that the new and active life now happily diffused into the body comes mainly from Scotland—avail themselves of the opportunity to raise a subscription of 10,000*l.* for the permanent endowment of their Theological College. By the members of the Church of England, of course, no attempt at celebration of the event is made ; but we cannot doubt that the memory of the day, and all the controversies to which it has given rise, will have a lasting effect. When the anger and irritation of the conflict have passed away, the questions will arise whether the formularies of their own Church are all they could wish them to be ; whether the Nonconformists, in the controversy, have not hit one or two blots in their system ; and whether they would not stand with a more open face before the world if they could point to a revised liturgy, a purging of the baptismal and the burial services, and a return in these matters to the simpler and clearer times of the primitive Church. And to all sects and denominations the event of 1662, rightly understood, reads the lesson that truth is to be preferred to material interests, and a clear conscience to world's wealth. The lesson is one and the same to all the ages ; its application varies with varying times. Then the world oppressed the Church ; now, perhaps, it comes in a more dangerous form, and attempts to corrupt it with its blandishments. May we be as faithful against the temptations of our generation as our fathers were in theirs !

A very small, but at the same time a curious controversy, has arisen in the Church of England. The Bishop of Oxford has issued a sort of pastoral address to the clergy of his diocese, enjoining them to direct the attention of their congregations to the propriety of offering prayers for peace in America, and to afford suitable pauses in the celebration of Divine service for the people to join in silent prayer for that object. No one quarrels with the object of the Bishop, but it has appeared to some zealous members of the Church that in issuing this injunction he has exceeded his powers. The opinions of two eminent civil lawyers have been given to that effect, and it is curious to find a ritualist like Dr. Wilberforce entangled in the meshes of the Act of Uniformity. The matter is a very small one, and the purpose is good ; but the opponents are not therefore to be condemned, for excellent intentions and small questions form, in almost every case, the groundwork for all sorts of usurpation and domination, whether temporal or spiritual.

The Wesleyan Methodist ministers held their 119th Annual Conference last month, at Camborne, in Cornwall. Notwithstanding the remote corner of England in which the meeting was held, there was a large gathering of the members ; and the interest in their deliberations excited among the primitive and warm-hearted people among whom they met was such as has not been paralleled since their fathers listened to the ministrations of John Wesley. The funds of the various institutions connected with the Conference are in a flourishing condition ; and the circuits that depend on external aid are gradually and rapidly diminishing. Concurrently with this, the home mission of the body, an institution lately engrafted on their itinerant system, receives increasing support, and may be considered to have taken its place among the permanent institutions of the society. In the discussions which took place as to the obligations lying upon authors belonging to their connexion, and other matters, some interesting glimpses were afforded as to the inner life of Wesleyan Methodism.

FOREIGN.

Is the time at hand, prefigured in sacred writ, when "there were voices and thunderings and lightnings, and there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great?" The events we now witness, and still more, the threatening indications that appear both in the political and ecclesiastical horizon, irresistibly remind us of that grandly-impressive scene in the apostolic vision, and warn us, at the least, to expect the opening of some new and startling chapter in the great book of God's government of the world. Not the least remarkable feature in these remarkable events is the bursting out of discord exactly in those places that are most certain to trouble the repose of the whole world. America might seem to be safe from any quarrel that would arise in Europe; so America is scourged with a civil war ever darkening down into more savage ferocity, and raging just in those parts and among that race whose quarrels most deeply affect the interests of Europe. In the Old World the clouds lower and the storms mutter just where for the last eighteen centuries society has received its mightiest impulses. Rome and Constantinople, the old seats of world empire, are again the seats of convulsive action, and men anxiously await the issue. It was thought that the Russian war had staved off the Eastern question for at least another generation; and lo! in six years from the peace the threads are all unravelled again; the Christian races bear with an impatience which every day increases the presence of their Mussulman lords, and the diplomatists at Constantinople are busily engaged—ostensibly at least, though some of them, it is suspected, not very sincerely—in composing strife, in which there is nothing so remarkable as their total want of success. As to Rome and Italy, the situation of affairs there looks blacker than ever; and the most lynx-eyed of politicians fail to see their way to a solution. The Pope will not move from his seat except by force; and the Emperor of the French, who keeps him there, will neither say Aye nor No to the eager and often-repeated demands for his removal. And with the hope thus long-deferred the Italian heart has become sick; Garibaldi, in defiance of his sovereign, has raised his standard, to which thousands of enthusiastic young men flock, with the scarcely-concealed object of marching on Rome.

The thoughtful observer cannot fail to be struck with the apparent insignificance of the causes that are producing these mighty events. So far as America is concerned, there are hardly two men who can agree upon the questions the North and South are fighting about. In the East, the Christians, whatever grievances they may still have, were never better governed than now; and in Italy we are presented with the singular spectacle of the Emperor of the French professing the utmost friendship for the King of Italy, and yet allowing his kingdom to fall in pieces, when one word from him would save it. In all this, no doubt, there are many petty intrigues and human passions at work; but in and through them all we cannot fail to discern a higher and mightier arm that is pushing these kingdoms and races into collision, breaking the iron and clay in pieces, and proclaiming with a voice that is almost audible in the din and crash of falling States, "I will overturn, overturn, overturn; till He come whose right it is, and I will give it Him."

In France, the Romish Church continues to make desperate efforts to maintain its tottering supremacy. There is renewed stir and activity to be observed everywhere; the bishops in their respective dioceses keep up the excitement; and the ignorant, but impressible peasantry, are every week urged to regard the Pope as the great corner-stone of human society—as, in fact and reality, a God upon earth. Some instances of this will be found in our correspondent's letter, which sound startling to Christian ears. We must not, however, overlook the effect they produce upon the French mind. In fact, we shall not rightly understand Louis Napoleon's vacillating policy at Rome unless we study it in the light of the turbulence and agitation fomented by the Ultramontane bishops in his own country. It seems, from our correspondent's letter, that the question of the marriage of priests, or of ex-priests, is not, as we had imagined, decided by the judgment of the provincial tribunal. The legal authorities have determined to carry it by appeal to a higher tribunal, where, it is said, every nerve will be strained to upset that decision of the inferior court by which the doctrine is held that the civil court takes no cognisance, and will not enforce, the observance of religious vows.

The distractions of political affairs has, for the moment, withdrawn public attention from the religious reformation of Italy. Nevertheless, the progress of the good work is marked even by the opposition it encounters; and though, as of old, the kingdom of God cometh not with observation, yet, from time to time, we have glimpses of the progress of spiritual truth in that beautiful and interesting land. Among those glimpses we may mention the festival of the Waldensian Churches, held high up the mountains of Pinerolo, of which a graphic description appeared, in the course of the month, in the Times newspaper. Representatives of the Vaudois from all their ramifications assembled on this interesting occasion, and it was satisfactory to find that the burden of the addresses delivered on the occasion was the memory of the late General Beckwith, as the benefactor of the Waldensian Churches. A singular story is told of the circumstances under which that gallant officer and good man was led to devote the last years of his life exclusively to their benefit. Happening to call one day on his former military chief, the Duke of Wellington, he was desired to step into the library till his grace had finished some business on which he was engaged. To pass away the time, he took up a book that was lying near, and when the Duke entered the room he found his visitor absorbed in the late Dr. Gilly's interesting memorials of the Vaudois. The turning over of those few pages decided the whole course of his future life, and strongly coloured the history of the Vaudois Churches. We may safely predict that so long as the Vaudois Church remains in Italy so long will the name of General Beckwith be mentioned in terms of affection and honour.

The intelligence from Germany this month is of great interest. An occasional correspondent furnishes us with information respecting the working of the new law in favour of Protestants in Austria, which will somewhat modify the enthusiasm with which its promulgation was regarded in this country. Our Frankfort correspondent recounts the history of a theological controversy which is now raging against Dr. Kahnis, a Professor of the University of Leipsic, who has shaken himself free of the stiff bonds of Lutheran High Churchmanship, and appears to have gone too far in the other direction of neology. It is thus that the new wine often deals with the old bottles, running to waste as it rends its bonds; but we are glad to learn from our correspondent's testimony, as well as from the extracts he gives from Dr. Kahnis's publications, that Dr. Hengstenberg is premature in classing him as a rationalist.

The small native Protestant Church in Syria is making itself felt in the districts around them. They have sent out a native preacher to the village of Homs, and they employ what we should call a city missionary in the town of Beyrout. Of course opposition and persecution from the other churches follow. The Romish and the Greek bodies, quarrelling over all other topics, unite in maltreating the poor Protestants. The Mohammedan population care little about any of the Christian bodies, but they find it safe to insult the weakest party. On them little or no impression is made. With respect to the best method of reaching the Mussulman mind, we call attention to the interesting letter of a Syrian correspondent, who, setting forth at length the large provision that was made in former days for Mohammedan literature, and its total neglect now, suggests that Christians might find access to the Mohammedans by the establishment of a Syrian College, open to all classes, where true learning in connexion with Christianity would be disseminated.

From the far East we have little to report. Glimpses of the moral condition of Japan are afforded in a letter from Nagasaki, in which also our correspondent reminds us that the late treaties with Christian countries have not altered the old Japanese law, which punishes the profession of Christianity by a native with death. For the present, therefore, we can but pray that these obstacles may in God's good time be removed.

The progress of the Central African Mission has been watched with eager interest since the intelligence of the death of Bishop Mackenzie. A letter has been received from that district, written by Dr. Livingstone himself, from which it will be seen that he too has had a narrow escape with his life, and that he was compelled, for the first time in Africa, to use fire-arms in self-defence. It is the slave-hunting, fostered by the Portuguese, that leads to all these painful scenes. The Doctor himself is as full of ardour and enterprise as ever; and while he devotes himself to the task of breaking up new ground, and exploring fresh countries, he is urgent that the mission work should not be given up at home. We believe there is no intention in England of relinquishing the enterprise, though the first clergyman to whom the honour of becoming Bishop Mackenzie's successor was offered has declined it.

BISHOP COLENZO ON THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.*

BISHOP COLENZO stands to Mr. Maurice in the relation of an interpreter to one who speaks in an unknown tongue; or of that one pupil of Hegel who alone was said by the philosopher to understand his system. Heroes have died unknown to fame, "quia carent vate sacro," and philosophers like Hegel have cried out for a true Hegelian to do for their thoughts what Socrates professed to do for the labouring minds of the Athenians of his day. But Mr. Maurice has found a writer who has done for him what Sydney Smith did for Bentham, viz.,—to "wash him, trim him, shave him, and force him into clean linen." Thanks to Bishop Colenso, the theology, slung like Socrates' basket in the clouds, is let down to earth. The door of the thinking shop is now thrown open, and by the aid of a plain-spoken disciple we shall get at the thoughts of the master. Before entering on a seriatim review of Bishop Colenso's opinions, we would acknowledge the admirable and lucid style in which he puts his thoughts. Dr. Colenso's mathematical training has lent such precision to his language, that his thoughts do not escape detection, as the cuttlefish darkens the water in order to defy pursuit. Were a prosecution for heresy instituted against Bishop Colenso, as it is reported the Bishop of Capetown wished to do, it would not be difficult to find out the obnoxious paragraphs, and to frame articles out of them for prosecution in an ecclesiastical court. To his credit be it said, Bishop Colenso does not "equivocate by the card," as some erroneous teachers have done in our day. He is as outspoken as poor Mr. Heath, and quite as ready to court a trial as Archdeacon Denison. His opponents will know where to find him, and can put their finger on the chapter and verse of this commentary which runs counter to the orthodox views. If this is a merit, Bishop Colenso is entitled to the full benefit of it. His candour passes the bounds of prudence. He is as aspiring for martyrdom as the Syrian hermit Telemachus, who came from the far East to Rome, and resolved to stop the gladiatorial contests, rushed into the middle of the amphitheatre, and threw himself between the combatants; whereupon, though he was slain by the fury of the populace, the horror excited by that act, and the admiration of his self-devotion, brought about the abolition of those games which the emperors had been unable to suppress. It is, perhaps, to excite the same disgust for the Arches Court, and the gladiatorial show which Dr. Lushington presides over, that a bishop has rushed into the arena, has uttered the "Ave Caesar! morituri te salutant," and net and prong in hand is ready to give or take death for the cause of Universalism.

Nor is this Dr. Colenso's only merit. He has caught the thread of the Apostle's argument in the Epistle to the Romans, and unravels it to the English reader with masterly skill and common sense. He has caught more distinctly than previous commentators the idea of the persons to whom, and the circumstances under which, this epistle was written. Between the two opposite theories—that it was addressed to a congregation of Jewish or of Gentile converts—it is not easy to steer a middle course. This Bishop Colenso very successfully does. After showing that neither of the extreme opinions corresponds with the facts of the case, he lays down his own theory, which is briefly this : He supposes that at the time when the Apostle wrote the Epistle to the Romans there was no Christian Church, properly so called, at Rome. There were, however, a body of Jews and proselytes more or less favourably disposed to accept Jesus as their Messiah, and to believe in His resurrection as that by which He was declared to be the Son of God, with power. We must throw ourselves back into those times before the destruction of Jerusalem and the constitution of the Christian Church as a separate religious sect, if we would understand how Judaism and Christianity were mixed and blended : the new cloth was sewed on to the old garment, and the new wine had not yet burst the old bottles. Aquila and Priscilla were probably the instruments through whom a clearer conception of what Christianity really was had been brought to the minds of these Jews and proselytes of Rome. The Apostle had met Aquila and Priscilla at Corinth—had there thoroughly instructed them in the way of the Lord ; so that the pious pair, on their return to Rome, were able to acquaint their countrymen there with the Apostle's doctrines and fellowship ; and so, in this irregular way, there sprang up a Christian assembly at Rome, which bore the same relation to the synagogue, that the Reformers, before the Reformation, did to the Church of Rome, with which they had not yet broken communion. It would, therefore, be more correct to speak of the converts at Rome to whom the Apostle wrote as Christianising Jews, than as Judaising Christians. This accounts, therefore, for the difference of manner with which the Apostle treats the same tendency in the Churches of Galatia and of Rome. To the Galatians, who had probably been converted out of heathenism directly, without passing through any transition stage of Judaism, he writes in language of stern rebuke, for having so soon turned away from him that called them to another gospel, which, instead, was not a gospel at all, but an apostacy into Judaism. His language to the Romans is quite different. While beating down the pretension of the Jew quite as sternly as in the Epistle to the Galatians, he recognises a truth in Judaism, and yearns over his brethren after the flesh, whose are the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises. In this respect the Epistle to the Romans stands midway between that to the Galatians and that to the Hebrews, in all which epistles he encounters and opposes the Judaising spirit ; but more tenderly in the latter case than in the former, as it was more excusable in the case of born Jews than of born Gentiles. The Christians at Rome—not yet constituted into a Church, but worshipping still in the synagogue—had probably made considerable advance in the knowledge of Christ, under the teaching which Priscilla and Aquila had learned from Paul when they spent some time with him in Corinth. The more enlightened among the body had probably begun to loosen their connexion with the synagogue, and to look with something like contempt on questions of meats and drinks, and carnal ordinances. This, of course, led to resistance on the part of the orthodox and Rabbinical party, and so a schism was already begun in the body, and the germ of the Christian Church preparing to disengage itself from its Jewish ceremonies. To a community in this state of mind the Apostle Paul would be naturally anxious to write, to give further countenance to the new views which Aquila and Priscilla had brought with them from Corinth. He therefore seized the opportunity of the visit to Rome of Phœbe, a deaconess of the Church of Corinth, and sent with her that epistle, which may have set at rest the controversies then stirred in Rome, but which has aroused the minds of men more than any document of equal length ever written, before or since. Such is the substance of Bishop Colenso's account of the origin of this epistle, and we think he has rightly caught the idea of the circumstances which led to its being written. It is a strong confirmation of this hypothesis that there is no mention made of Church orders, or even of offices. Unlike the pastoral epistles, and even the circular letter to the Ephesians, in which Church offices are mentioned, there is no such reference in the Epistle to the Romans. He speaks, indeed, of various charisms or graces—of the grace of prophecy, of ministry, of teaching, of exhortation. But in this there is nothing more than the exercise of certain gifts, such as might be evidenced in a body which had not come out from another body, or dispensed with the services of its ministry.

There are many other features in this commentary of which we could speak with praise. We particularly like the way in which the Bishop handles the doctrine of election, and shows how the Apostle draws out that much-controverted doctrine from his spiritual armoury to beat down the pretensions of the Jew to be the elect of God. The Jews were the predestinarians whom the Apostle had to controvert; and this he does, first, by exposing the immoral consequence of their naked Predestinarianism; and next, by asserting God's sovereignty as superior to any fancied limitations of His judgment and mercy, which they had extracted out of their predestinarian theories. The Jew thought that he had tied the hands of God by certain texts out of the written Word; but the Apostle shows that they were as the green withes with which the Philistines thought to bind Samson. The doctrine of election, therefore, as set forth by the Apostle Paul, is not so much a predestinarian dogma, as explained by Calvin and his school, as it is a truth adversative to the pretensions of the Jew: it is a controversial proposition, as justification by grace is controversial to justification by works, and only to be understood, as all controversial propositions are, by reference to the original dogma it is meant to overturn.

In this again we see nothing to differ with Bishop Colenso, and think that he has very clearly expounded the Apostle's meaning. But the real gratamen against the Bishop is for the length to which he has carried his belief in God's universal love to man. Are we to be always reminded in vain by deep-thinkers like Bishop Butler, Mansel, and others, that we have not faculties to pursue certain principles into their remote consequences? The "first flowings of Scripture," to use Bacon's phrase, is all which we should draw out of the winepress. Instead of that, the method of too many acute, but not cautious thinkers, is to pursue a principle to its extreme conclusions, and that, too, regardless of the practical mischief of these conclusions. Thus there emerge two theologies out of two rival theories, each of which is reasoned out very consistently from a single attribute of God. Set out with an exclusive sense of the Divine justice, and coupled with the attribute of sovereignty, you must reason yourself into the extreme (so-called) Calvinistic theory of particular election, and the reprobation of the immense majority of mankind to everlasting perdition. The præterition and consequent perdition of the majority of mankind does no violence, to our sense, either of the Divine justice or sovereignty. One glance at His attribute of love would dispel this gloomy theology, and cause us to suspect our system as being wise above what is written. On the other hand, if we set out with the single attribute of love, we shall reason out a theology in which the abiding wrath of God against sin can have no place. In such a system evil is but the selfwill of the child that does not yet know its parent, and all punishment is the parent's chastisement recalling the child to its duty. Sin, in this point of view, is only the revolt of the flesh against the spirit, the strength of the lower appetites, and the weakness of the higher, or spiritual, desires. It is thus a defect of the spirit, which is not yet conscious of its high destinies, and of the image of God in which it was made. To remedy this state of evil there needs only that the spirit be given the mastery over the flesh; redemption is not so much the recovery of the lost as the discovery to the spirit of its high origin and ultimate destiny. But this view of the matter is quite inadequate to account for spiritual wickedness. It will partly explain the fall of man, but it throws no light upon the fall of angels. A state in which the spirit itself becomes wholly corrupt, in which light is put for darkness, and sweet for bitter, is one of which the Platonic philosophy is hardly conscious. Hence it is that the Alexandrian fathers were unable to realise the eternity of evil, and the everlasting perdition of the fallen angels. They had so accustomed themselves to one aspect of evil, the lower and human side of the mystery of wickedness, that the higher, or angelic side, was beyond their conception. They saw a way for the restitution of man through the subjection of the flesh to the spirit, and they could only think of angels as affected by the same remedial process. The Platonic dogma, that all punishment was purgative, lay at the root of all these theories of retribution in the future world, and therefore not only from pure compassion for the lost, but also quite consistently with their general cast of thought, they looked forward to a time when all evil would be burned out by suffering, and the pure gold of the Divine image purged from the dross of sensual evil in the fires of the future world. It is easy to see how this fond notion of the recovery of all fallen spirits is connected with the doctrine of the fatherhood of God. Think of the Divine nature as possessed of this attribute of love only, and we cannot escape the conviction that—

Somehow good
Will be the final goal of ill,
To sins of nature, faults of will,
Defects of doubt, or taints of blood;
That nothing walks with aimless feet;
That not one soul shall be destroyed,
Or cast like rubbish in the void,
When God shall make the pile complete.

Bishop Colenso is far the most plain-spoken and intelligible of the school of neo-Platonists which have arisen among us of late years. If the opinions of Origen are to be brought to life again, after being laid to sleep for many centuries, they could not have found a more thorough and consistent advocate. While Mr. Maurice opens his mouth in parables, and Mr. Tennyson utters dark sayings on the harp of the laureate, the Bishop bravely throws off disguise, and declares his adhesion to Universalism in language as lucid as any which Paley or Whately ever wrote.

It is in the interpretation of verse 21 of the 8th chapter of the Epistle to the Romans that Bishop Colenso most explicitly states what his views now are of the essential nature of future punishment. He says (p. 197) that he formerly held—only, however, in an uninquiring way—the popular view of endless punishment. “For my own part,” he says, “I own I acquiesced in it, seeing some reasons for assuming it to be true, knowing that the mass of my clerical brethren assented to it with myself, and contenting myself with making some reference to it now and then in my ministrations, without caring to dwell deliberately upon it, and considering what might be urged against it.”

“The controversy which arose about Mr. Maurice’s essay,” he goes on to say, “brought the whole subject before me; and for the last seven years I have carefully studied it, with an earnest desire to know the truth of God upon the matter, and with an humble prayer for the guidance and teaching of the Holy Spirit in the search for it. I now declare that I can no longer maintain or give utterance to the doctrine of the endlessness of future punishments; that I dare not dogmatise at all on the matter; that I can only lay my hand upon my mouth, and leave it in the hands of the righteous and merciful Judge; that I see that the word eternal does not mean endless; and for such reasons as the following I entertain the ‘hidden hope’ that there are remedial processes, when this life is ended, of which, at present, we know nothing; but which the Lord—the righteous Judge—will administer as He, in His wisdom, shall see to be good.”

But though the Bishop disclaims all dogmatism, he proceeds to reason out his “hidden hope” as definitely as any dogma. There is nothing new in his reasons; they have been stated over and over again by Universalists in England and America. 1. He prepares us for these opinions by the argument that Protestantism is in the minority in this, as in other essential matters. The Greek and Latin Churches both agree to hold by a locus penitentiae in the hidden world; and so, if Catholic consent is worth anything, the Universalists are more Catholic than ordinary and orthodox Protestants. Non tali auxilio we should say to the Bishop in search of auxiliaries among the Purgatorians of the Greek and Latin Churches. Nay, we will frankly admit that, if popularity is to be the test of truth, the remedial view of future punishment is likely to prevail over that which holds that future punishments are final. But we are not accustomed to decide these questions by a mere show of hands. The appeal lies to Scripture, not to the prejudices or partialities of erring men and fallen churches. 2. In the next place, the Bishop relies upon the text, that the servant who knew his lord’s will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, was to be beaten with many stripes. But he who knew it not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes. He contends that here a gradation of punishment is spoken of, and that there can be no gradation of endless, infinite, irremediable woe. Here we join issue with the Bishop. Sentences may be capital, yet there may be degrees of torture under them, of ignominy attending the execution. It makes some difference to a soldier's feelings whether he is shot or hanged as a spy, to a rebel whether he is attainted and his estates confiscated to the Crown or not. Though all who departed from Him in this life may be banished everlastingly from God, there must be considerable difference between the worm of remorse and the fire of passion in a Judas and in one who had not sinned, as he did, against light and grace. The many stripes in the one case, and the few in the other, will be self-inflicted. Some will have more to reproach themselves with than others—higher hopes trifled with, more frequent appeals to conscience slighted, more quickening emotions of grace quenched. It will be more tolerable for Sodom in the day of judgment than for Chorazin. Remorse will sit more lightly even on the guilty inhabitants of the cities of the plain than on those who slighted the love of the Son of Man in the days of His ministry upon earth. We shrink from saying, with the Florentine poet, who had no better guide than Virgil in his descent into the circles of woe, that in the uppermost circle of all "no plaint was heard except of sighs, that made the eternal air to tremble, not caused by tortures, but by grief." We should shrink from accounting for the perdition of the heathen, as Dante roundly does, that—

These of sin
Were blameless, and if aught they merited,
It profits not, since baptism was not theirs
The portal to thy faith. If they before
The Gospel lived, they served not God aright,
And amongst such am I. For these defects,
And for no other evil, are we lost;
Only so far afflicted that we live,
Desiring without hope.

Were there no remorse in the world of spirits, hell would not be hell. The Limbus Patrum is a fiction of the schoolmen, invented to reconcile their dogma of the saving efficacy of baptism with their wish to deal indulgently with the virtuous heathen. But while abhorring the thought that any could be punished everlastingly, not for sin committed, but for defect of the rite of baptism, we can still see that there will be differences in those degrees of remorse and punishment, answering to the few and many stripes, yet all compatible with a sentence of everlasting banishment from the presence of God. So that the text upon which the Bishop relies to prove that there will be a term of future punishment only implies that there will be different degrees in the wrath of God, though that wrath may be alike abiding upon all.

3. The next argument produced is for the impossibility of drawing the line sharply at the hour of death between those who ought to be admitted to endless blessedness and those who ought to be consigned to endless woe. But our only answer to this is, that because we cannot draw the line, is it to be said that, therefore, God cannot do so? We need not be careful to vindicate the character of God: shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?

4. The fourth argument is the old plan of purgatory, dressed up again in another shape. Do not the good, the Bishop contends, need some cleansing process after death, to purify their souls from sin? And if some, even the most saintly, require the remains of sin to be burned out by suffering in the future world, why exclude others from the benefit of the same purifying fires? It is but a question more or less with the sin of the regenerate and the unregenerate. If the regenerate must suffer a little, why should not the unregenerate suffer somewhat more; so that the exit be the same to all, and the outlet at the end be an entrance into life? To all this special pleading we only answer, What is written? We are nowhere told of the remains of sin needing expiation in the case of the regenerate, and therefore conclude that the doctrine of purgatory, whether taught by the doctors of Trent or the Bishop of Natal, is "a fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God."

5. The fifth argument is founded on the doctrine of growth. In all life there is advance. There are degrees of blessedness in heaven, and the child that died at its birth cannot be expected to enter into the enjoyment of such a weight of sudden glory as the martyr Stephen or the Apostle Paul. This leads Dr. Colenso on so far as to say that, as there is increase and an upward ascent to glory, so there may be decrease of joy in heaven. We shrink from penning the thought. With a daring consistency, which we cannot help admiring while we deplore it, the Bishop seems to set up a ladder from heaven to hell, and angels of God ascending and descending continually the rounds of spiritual perfection and declension. So it always is with those who wish to be more merciful than the Bible. Universalism, by a kind of fatal retribution, brings us back to a state in which, as none are sure of being everlastingly lost, none can be sure of being everlastingly saved. Those who would throw down some of the pavement of heaven to cover over the pit of hell, rob us of more than they regain by that robbery. Surely tender mercies like these are cruel!

The sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth arguments are little else than repetitions of the foregoing put in another form. It is needless to go into them at greater length. They are only old foes in new faces—purgatorian pleas put forth under a Protestant mask. We might meet them on the great scriptural ground that they annul the necessity for the atoning death of Christ. If all punishment must be remedial, then Christ has suffered in vain, and we may be healed otherwise than by His stripes. The Bishop, we fear, would evade the force of this argument, by holding, with Mr. Maurice, that the death of Christ was not sacrificial, but exemplary; that it was the sublime of surrender the Divine in human form, pleasing not Himself, but as it is written, "The reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me." We can only again reply, What saith the Scripture. But we must not be led away at present to take up the argument for the atonement.

But the real ground out of which all the Bishop's aberrations from right doctrine spring is his inadequate conception of the character of God. Love is, we grant it, more than an attribute; it is His very nature and property. Fatherhood is the primal relation in which He stands to His rational creatures. But love is only one side of holiness, as justice is the other: apart from holiness love is indulgence, and justice is severity. Holiness is the central attribute which binds together God's love and His justice in our conceptions. In the Bible God is never named but as the God of holiness—this is His name, and this is

His memorial for ever. "Holiness to the Lord" was the signature on the high priest's mitre. At one time God's holiness is signalised in acts of judgment, and at another time in acts of mercy; but in this God alters not, that He is alway holy. Now the justest conception we can have of holiness is an unalterable hatred of sin. These are contrary the one to the other. Sin is unholiness, and therefore to sin, God must be implacably opposed. How He may deal with sin must depend on the exercise of His other attributes. If He whets His glittering sword, and lays hold upon judgment, then He must confound the sinner with his sin in everlasting perdition. Still God would be alway holy. If, on the other hand, He would stretch out His arms of mercy, and draw the sinner with cords of love, He can only do so consistently with His holiness. God may reconcile the sinner, but He can never be reconciled with sin. His holiness forbids that, and therefore it was impossible (be it said with becoming reverence) for God to redeem the sinner without bathing His sword of judgment, without an implacable sentence upon sin—a hot, hissing thunderbolt to fall from heaven to blast the sin while it spared the sinner. This is the story of the cross—this is the doctrine of the atonement, which is foolishness to our modern Greeks. Redemption without expiation would have been a wrong to the holiness of God. God could never take His fallen child back to His bosom until the poison of sin had been cast out of that child's nature. In the case of the fallen angels there was no room for redemption, because the sin was spiritual, and took its rise from within. Sin and the sinner were inseparable, and so Christ took not on Him the nature of angels. But in the case of man, as sin was like the serpents which fastened on the Israelites in the wilderness, or that viper which, coming out of the bundle of sticks, fastened on Paul's hand at Melita, the evil coming from without, the separation was possible, and therefore redemption came from without. But the evil had so infused itself into the nature of man, that the mere shaking off of the venomous beast could not deliver man from his inborn enemy. The serpent nature must be put under a ban, and set upon a pole to die in effigy, if man was to be delivered from its venom. Behold, then, the wisdom and goodness of God. His love attracted, but His holiness repelled man. Till man could be taught to hate sin as God hates it, there could be no real reconciliation between the two. Redemption on any other terms than these would have been only a hollow truce. The proclamation of God's fatherhood, when not made under the shadow of the cross, is to cheat man with a lie; it is to speak peace when there is no peace, for there is no peace saith my God to the wicked. But the cross of Christ exhibits the holiness of God and man's unholiness. Then we learn to think with God about sin—to hate it as He hates it, to count the cost of our sins, by putting in a vial the water and the blood which flowed from the riven side of Jesus. Italian painters quaintly draw little cherubs holding sacramental cups to catch the drops as they fall from the head, hands, and feet of the Redeemer on the cross. That faith does for herself: it puts not its penitential tears only in a bottle, but the atoning water and blood of Him who came not by water only, but by water and blood, and it sees in these precious drops the expression of God's deep hatred of sin, as well as of His great love to the sinner. A sentimental view of the cross would represent it as an act of pure love; but it was an act of pure holiness as well. Nothing but this would ever strike into man the same horror of sin which God feels; until man is filled with some of this God-like horror of sin he has not felt real repentance, but is yet in his sins. To tell him in that state of a fatherly love, of a bosom open to receive him, is to beguile him with a lie. God has no bosom open for sinners as such—the lowest depths of hell were paradise in comparison to the presence of God and the breath of His holiness. That breath, which is as the dew of the morning to a holy spirit, could be a consuming fire to an unholy. Now the school to which Bishop Colenso belongs have sacrificed one attribute of God to the other. They proclaim a God of love, but not a God of holiness. We do not mean that they deny it, or doubt it. Far be it from us to make so uncharitable a reflection. What we mean is, that holiness has no place in their scheme of man's recovery. In the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world they see only an example of God's great love, and how, by self-surrender, He could draw men to surrender their selfwills to His service. This is a timid, furtive, one-eyed view of the cross. It is not the full look of faith, which sees there all God's hatred of sin, and all God's love to the sinner, exhibited in one great act of sacrifice.

We do not deny that we see in these modern Alexandrians a reaction from another and an opposite school. As Tertullian and Origen, the chiefs of the rival schools of the rival cities of North Africa, were contrasted in their day, so those who hold an exclusive view of the fatherhood of God are a reaction from those who reason from God's sovereignty and a limited atonement. The rigid predestinarian, reasoning from the justice of God only, has provoked the Universalist to reason quite as strictly and quite as dogmatically from the love of God. When will men see that action and reaction are equal, and that the true concordat for conflicting systems is behind the holiness of God—the attribute by which alone His justice and His love are reconciled at the cross of Christ?

We do not write, then, as alarmists about Bishop Colenso's book. We have had enough of controversy about the "Essays and Reviews," and are not a little ashamed of the great windbags which were blown into the theological market for and against these seven Essayists.

Truth wounded yet shall live again,
The eternal years of God are hers,
But error wounded writhes in pain,
And dies among her worshippers.

We have heard so often that the ark was in danger, that we hear with some composure that it is only a colonial bishop who has been reacting Origen on the South-east coast of Africa. Reginald Pecocke, Bishop of Chichester, made some stir as a heresiarch in the fifteenth century. The apparitors and summoners of Lambeth—those terrible functionaries—the counterpart of the religious newspapers of our day, were set in motion, and the Bishop only escaped the fate of the Lollards by abandoning opinions in the support of which he could not fall back upon the faith of the Lollards. Who now knows or cares for the opinions of Reginald Pecocke, Bishop of Chichester? Some of his writings, lately edited under the sanction of the Master of the Rolls, are a curious anticipation of our liberal school of divines.

He was a worthy predecessor of Bishop Rundell of last century, and of Bishop Colenso of this. "Our little systems have their day," and this is especially true of the systems of our philosophical divines—the theories seldom outlive their author. Every plant which our Heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up. Relying upon this word, we have no fear that Bishop Colenso's opinions will spread far, or last long. The Universalist theory has been tried often, and has always failed. It labours under the fatal objection, which we have noticed already, that as much as it takes from our fear of hell it also takes from our security of heaven. The doctrine of rewards and punishments must stand or fall together. With this view of the question we may safely leave this controversy to be settled by the conscience and common-sense of a jury of twelve Christian men taken at random out of any twelve churches or chapels in London.

Missionary Work in India.

THE SCHOOLROOM AND THE PULPIT.*

I HAVE just now read an article in the June number of Evangelical Christendom, signed by "G.," and entitled "The Schoolroom and the Pulpit."

With some of the writer's statements I cordially agree. From others I as cordially dissent. Had the writer taken a wider and more impartial view of missionary operations in India, and had he examined the Scriptures a little more fully, he would not, I feel persuaded, have penned the statements, or drawn the conclusions we find recorded in his paper.

I agree with him in maintaining that the great, the chief business of the missionary is κηρύσσειν, to preach the Gospel. But when our friend confines the term to him who proclaims the Gospel from village to village, and from town to town, and withholds it from the missionary who proclaims the same Gospel to a class of boys in a school, I must here offer my dissent. I maintain that when Dr. Duff addresses his Be Hari, Lall-Sings, and Lall-Des and Jagadishwars, and a hundred youths beside, assembled from all parts of Bengal, on the great truths of the Gospel, he is a κήρυξ (herald), fulfilling Christ's last command. I hold that when the late revered John Anderson, of Madras, was pouring out from his full heart the marrow of the Gospel to his Rajah Gopals and companions, and when the late beloved Nesbit and his colleagues opened up the treasure of Life to our Dunjibhais and Narayans, to our Shripats and Bheramjis, men who are not ashamed to proclaim the truth to their idolatrous brethren, they proved themselves true κήρυκες (heralds) of the Cross. It is my honest conviction that when I, and I may add, some hundreds of my brethren in India, surrounded by our morning or mid-day class of twenty, forty, or sixty youths, and removed from all distracting causes, impress on their minds the living truths of the Gospel, we are acting the κήρυκες (heralds) of the Cross, as fully and essentially as when in the afternoon we take our stand in the public bazaar and proclaim to a mixed multitude, amid much noise, the same precious truths. It is not correct to apply the term private to a mission school in India. Such places are generally open to the public; especially when the missionary attends to proclaim the truth. Again, each scholar is the representative of a distinct family, and we are aware that in many instances these boys carry the truth where the missionary is never admitted—into the privacy of the family circle. Surely the missionary propounding the truth to his class is not less a public teacher than was Christ, when He preached the Gospel to Nicodemus, to the solitary woman of Samaria; nor than Philip, when he sat in the eunuch's chariot and preached unto him Jesus; nor than Peter, when in a private room he, for the first time, preached to the Gentiles that to them also God granted repentance unto life; nor than Paul, who for two years preached in his own private house "the kingdom of God, and taught those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ." If our friend's theory—namely, village and town—that is, bazaar preaching, and this alone—be the correct one, then Christ and His Apostles committed grave errors in proclaiming the Gospel thus privately.

* We publish this communication from an Indian missionary, in reply to the paper from a brother missionary, and which appeared in our June number, but in this case, as well as in the former, we wish it to be understood that the writer is solely responsible for the opinions expressed, and for his mode of advocating them. We desire to promote free discussion on the subject.—Enc. Evangelical Christendom.

So far as our respected friend objects to missionaries spending their time in imparting to pupils mere secular knowledge, he is correct. Other agents may be found for secular departments, and missionaries should, and generally do, give themselves to the Word. But it should be borne in mind by our friends in Europe that it is of vast importance to the missionary that his native audience know the truth in science, the truth in physics and metaphysics. The Hindu doctrines on astronomy, geography, &c., are egregiously erroneous and absurd; for example, their concentric oceans of milk, wine, ghee-water, &c.; Mount Merū standing like an inverted cone, narrowest at the base, and broadest at the summit. And not only so, but these absurd doctrines form a part of their religious code, and the Hindu is as stringently bound to believe these as he is bound to believe in the absurd dogmas regarding his vile incarnations. Remove these erroneous views, by giving them the truth in science, and you weaken the whole fabric of Hinduism, and necessarily lead the pupil to question the Divine origin of his Shastars. By all means let us impart the truth on these subjects; but let us do so by a lay or subordinate agency.

Again, let our friends in Europe remember that in India there are six, indeed seven, months in the year, three so intensely hot, and four so incessantly rainy, that it is physically impossible for the missionary to itinerate from town to town to preach the truth. He is during that time confined to his home, and with convenience may devote a large portion of his time to school-classes. Moreover, a portion of every day—all the year round—is so scorching, that he cannot take his stand in the bazaar or prosecute his journey. During these periods few spheres prove more inviting than a class of youths, and few minds in the bazaar are better fitted, humanly speaking, to receive the truth than the minds of these young people, already thirsting for knowledge. And well do I know many brethren, devoted itinerants also, who, during the periods referred to, devote much attention to the pupils in these schools.

I agree with "G.," that, as a rule, preaching from town to town is the most important part of the missionary's work. But owing to the state in which we find India, this cannot by any means be regarded as the whole of his work. Did parents attend to the proper instruction of their children, or were our Government system of education conducted on such principles as it is, for example, in the North of Ireland, the missionary would not be called on to devote much time to schools. But this is not so. Throughout the wide plains of India we do not find the truth, in any sense, taught in a single indigenous school. Idolatry is taught in all, the truth in none. Government schools openly ignore all religions, and exclude the Bible from their classes. The only school, among the two hundred millions of India, where the truth in Jesus is to be found, is in that of the missionary. The natives of India must now have instruction. Schools are demanded all over the land. The people themselves will not train their sons on right principles. The Government also refuses. The door is open to the missionary. Must he not enter? If, indeed, he must give his time to secular instruction, he ought to refuse. But no such embargo is laid on the missionary; parents willingly entrust their children to him, well knowing that he makes the inculcation of Christian truth a sine qua non in his school. As long, then, as the missionary can, by subordinate agents, impart secular truths, and give his own time directly to the religious element, he fulfils a most important duty. Here, among the thousands and tens of thousands of India's neglected children, is a most inviting field of labour, and without at all infringing on his other duties as an itinerating κηρύξ (herald), he may give one-third of his time to preach (κηρύσσειν, or διδάσκειν) to these thousands the unsearchable riches of Christ.

"G." asserts "that the most common word used for the promulgation of the Gospel in the New Testament is κηρύσσω." Not so. The terms διδάσκω and εὐαγγελίζομαι are still more commonly used. Of this any one who reads the original may see by himself in a moment. Before so summarily disposing of the service expressed by the term teaching (διδάσκειν), he ought to have glanced at the ministry of Jesus, the Master Herald; for, from the beginning to the close of that ministry, διδάσκειν (to teach) is the term most commonly used to express Christ's promulgation of the Gospel.

From a multitude of instances of the use of διδάσκειν, in the connexion stated, I adduce a very few. On the preaching of the most memorable sermon that was ever heard, it is said of Christ that—

"He opened his mouth and taught."—Matt. v. 2.

"He taught in the temple," "out of the ship," &c.

A whole year Paul and Barnabas taught much people in Antioch.—Acts xi. 26.

"I have taught you publicly, and from house to house."—Acts xx. 20.

"The things that thou hast heard of me, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also."—2 Tim. ii. 2.

In like manner of εὐαγγελίζομαι, I submit a few from a great number of instances, when the term means preaching the Gospel, and that in the most public manner, to the heathen as well as to the Jew:—

"The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor."—Luke iv. 18.

"They that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word."—Acts viii. 4.

"I am ready to preach the Gospel to you that are at Rome also."—Rom. i. 15.

"To reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the heathen."—Gal. i. 16.

"That I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ."—Eph. iii. 8.

I might multiply such instances; but enough to show that "G.'s" critique on the term κηρύσσω is calculated to mislead the cursory reader. It is clear that he has no authority for withholding any of these terms from the missionary, when imparting the truth to a class of boys—it may be in a schoolroom, or in a church, in the public verandah, or in "his own private house." Whether the missionary engage in teaching or heralding, in preaching or disciplining, it is enough for him to know that he has for his exemplars Jesus and His Apostles.

The candid reader of the New Testament will also perceive that the word μαθητεύσας (make disciples), at the close of the Gospel of Matthew, is as well entitled to be termed Christ's "final command" as κηρύξαι in the concluding verses of Mark, though our friend "G." insinuates the contrary. It is dangerous to form a theory by our own wisdom, and then go a-begging to the Scriptures for support to that theory. Much safer is it first to search the Scriptures, and then deduce our rule of action. We hold that the missionary who διδάσχει (teaches) his class of boys, or κηρύσσει (heralds) the Gospel in the public street, or εὐαγγελίζεται (preaches) to all comers, or μαθητεύει (instructs) the candidate for the ministry, in either case fulfils the final command of Jesus, and copies the example of Christ and His Apostles; and it is his business to discriminate by which mode (possibly two or three combined) he is likely to accomplish the greatest amount of good.

Christ's command and the practice of the Apostles is, "Preach the Gospel to every creature"—that is, of every language and clime wherein we find access—in the house, or by the way, on board ship, in the schoolroom or bazaar, in the pulpit or on the hillside—we are to proclaim the Gospel to every creature; and I would say to "G.," "Go on, brother, heralding the Gospel in the bazaar; for thus you are obeying Christ's command;" and I believe I am doing the same when, in the morning, I give two hours to my class, and in the evening a similar period to the bazaar.

"G." decides, to his own satisfaction, that preaching from town to town is "God's method;" that we should follow this course, unconcerned, whether there be "more or fewer converts." Yet he is not unconcerned about results, for he adduces two examples, the Agra College and Church Mission Schools of Calcutta, where it appears very few conversions have occurred for the last twenty-five years; and these two facts he considers sufficient to prove "the failure of our mission schools." But I could point to districts where the Gospel has been proclaimed for a similar period, and to a city of eighty thousand inhabitants where preaching in the bazaars has been sustained for more than forty years; and yet in these cases there have been still fewer conversions than in the cases instanced by "G.;" but this would not show a fair state of the question, because there are other, and neighbouring districts, where a similar mode of preaching has proved abundantly successful. And just so "G." does not give the reader a fair view of the matter, when by his two examples he settles the question of mission schools. Why does he ignore all that has been accomplished in the Free Church Schools at the several presidencies—in the Church Mission Schools out of Calcutta, for example, in Santipur, Benares, &c.? Why overlook all that our American and German brethren have been doing for the youth of India? and why not candidly admit the fact that, by the Divine blessing, these schools have sent forth a host of native evangelists, who are this day successful heralds to the heathen? God is signally blessing this department of missionary labour. Let us not ignore, but thankfully acknowledge, this at His hand. And then shall we say that the only fruit of education is present conversion? Beyond this point is no good being achieved? Is there no breaking down of Hinduism, no removal of error, no preparation for the Gospel of peace? Assuredly there is. Is it unsafe and unwise to lodge the precious seed in the young mind, and leave results in God's hand?

Why should "G." lament if many of our trained pupils pass to Government and railway offices? It is only the other day that one of India's best and greatest statesmen, long resident in the country, stated publicly that, of all the natives in such offices, the pupils from mission schools command the greatest amount of confidence. Take the thousands, I may say millions, who have heard the Gospel publicly proclaimed in our bazaars, place them by the small number of pupils to whom the same Gospel has been preached. In proportion to their numbers, which class has yielded the greater amount of fruit? "G." is not prepared to say the former.

"G." says that "missionaries engage the services of the Hindus to teach Christianity—who, of course, pervert the minds of the boys, and strive to make them laugh at the Bible with all their might;" and adds: "This is a horrible truth, but it is the truth." Now let me put a simple question to "G."—Are you certain that you here state THE WHOLE TRUTH, AND NOTHING BUT THE TRUTH. I leave this question with "G." Meantime, I say that it is well known that the rule in mission schools is that missionaries and converted natives only teach Christianity, and that heathen teachers are confined to the secular department. "G." refers to what is by far the exception—indeed, I may say, the abuse—in mission schools, and strangely submits this without qualification, as if it were the rule. I admit, indeed, that, with all our precautions, the minds of the boys in our schools will sometimes be perverted, and they will laugh at the Bible, perhaps "with all their might," and this is "horrible." But has "G." never, while preaching in the bazaar, been horrified when, for example, Mussulmans propose blasphemous and obscene queries regarding the Son of God and His relation to the Virgin Mary? and has his heart never been agonised on hearing Hindus identify Christ with Krishna, their vilest of incarnations? Doubtless he has. But does he on that account relinquish public preaching? No, assuredly. Neither can the faithful teacher turn away from the youth of India, though they may sometimes "laugh with all their might at the Bible."

In fine, I would say to those revered friends and to the churches at home interested in India, fear not to let part of your contributions be appropriated to mission schools. Grudge not the comparatively small sum which enables the missionary continuously to impart the truth to more than one hundred thousand young minds. Be assured these young minds are quite as susceptible of the truth as those of the mixed audiences we find in the bazaar. Rest satisfied that such labour has not, and will not be in vain. Let the missionary, wherever he can, and to the utmost of his ability, impart the truths of the Gospel to the young, as well as the most advanced in years, and let him leave results to God.

Deaconesses' Work in Syria.

APPEAL ON BEHALF OF THE KAISERWERTH DEACONESSSES' ORPHANAGE AT BEYROUT.

IN March of this year 106 Syrian orphan children, stray waifs from the frightful catastrophe of the Lebanon, were moving into a clean, new, roomy, healthy house by the sea, at Beyrout, with the noble women who had adopted them, Deaconesses from a far off northern home—Kaiserwerth, on the Rhine—the same poor, homely institution which had built them their house. The house was solemnly consecrated to God, whose work indeed it is, more visibly perhaps than even works of charity usually are. For surely out of less money so much good has rarely been done. But how is bread to be put into these 106 mouths? That is now the question.

The mother institution at Kaiserwerth has already a yearly deficit of more than 1,000*l.* for herself. Even with provisions so cheap as they are this year in Syria, the Syrian Institution costs 1,000*l.* a year.

And it must not be supposed that these children are pampered or spoiled in idleness. They are brought up to wholesome habits of household industry, unknown among Syrian women. Four Deaconesses direct this part of their education. Each little orphan has its own little office, sweeping, scrubbing, cleaning knives, cleaning windows, and so on.

There is a Children's Infirmary in the house, and many of the pupils are destined for nurses and for female teachers, in order to spread the blessings they have themselves received. Three other Deaconesses, two Arab Protestant schoolmistresses, and one English, teach them their lessons. 322 children have, since the Lebanon massacre, passed through their hands. Of these, 119 were Greek Church, 128 Maronites, 33 Protestants, 42 Roman Catholics. To show what a work of regeneration has to be done, I may state that the greatest difficulty the "Sisters" meet with is the untruthfulness which seems part of the national character. The children are as little ashamed to be caught in a nasty lie—I must call it by its own name—as a fish to be seen in the water.

There is a great inaptitude for spiritual things, which one would not have expected in these Syrian children. One of the Sisters was trying to teach them that “the Saviour’s is the best gift.” And upon asking them afterwards, “What is the best gift?” one answered, “A mess of lentil pottage” (Esau’s), and another, “Silk worms.”

Their natural ability is very great. They learn readily to read and write Arabic, and to read German and English (the latter for the sake of bringing a greater variety of books within their reach), and many who did not know how to read or write when they came, will now ask leave to write a letter in Arabic during playtime. They are very apt at needlework. They already make a good part of the linen for the hospital. They are taught to darn and knit, the object being to make them good household servants, of which there is a lamentable deficiency in Syria.

Besides the children, sixty-nine widows (also out of the Lebanon massacre) have been nursed and provided for by the Deaconesses. All but a very few (rendered incapable by blindness or some such cause) have now been restored by the Sisters to their homes, or otherwise placed.

Three other Kaiserwerth Deaconesses nurse in the Women’s Hospital in Beyrout, opened in March, 1861, by the English and American and German Committee. It has received 495 sick, and is just as full as ever.

The Deaconesses have also nursed 750 patients in Sidon, which hospital is now, alas! given up from poverty. When these Deaconesses left Sidon a great crowd assembled to see the Sisters once more, and accompany them out of the city with tears, crying out that they were “their mothers,” the “flowers of their hearts,” the “light of their eyes,” and calling down God’s blessing upon them.

The Prussian consular agent, a native, has taken a house for the Sisters in Sidon, hoping that they will come back, if funds can be raised. Even the children’s gratitude is a hopeful quality. They are continually asking the Sisters to write to thank their unknown benefactors in Europe.

Since October, 1860, these Kaiserwerth Deaconesses have been at work in Syria—comforting, nursing, feeding, clothing, teaching—and, if possible, in everything, more touched by (and more applying their efforts to) the spiritual than the bodily needs of these poor women and children.

I have been asked by Pastor Fliedner, who founded the Kaiserwerth Institution of Deaconesses, and has in twenty-six years spread its action over nearly all Europe, parts of Asia, Africa, and America, on the smallest funds that ever supported so immense a sphere—I have been asked by him to make more known in England this work of his Deaconesses in Syria. England has already largely co-operated. Indeed, all Evangelical Christendom have been united in the effort to give back to Syria some of the blessings we have received thence.

Pastor Fliedner has made a calculation, by which the 1,000*l.* a year necessary to keep up the Beyrout Orphanage and School could be raised in Evangelical Christendom. And in this calculation he debits England with 200*l.* a year.*

FRANCE.

—, France, September, 1862.

INTERNAL DISPUTES IN THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT RESPECTING THE ROMAN QUESTION.

The last events which have taken place in Italy, far from allaying the violence of the debates respecting the Roman question, have rendered them still more impassioned, whether in the press or in the deliberations of the Cabinet. It would seem that Napoleon III. is abstracted, uneasy, and taciturn; and that he carefully conceals his thoughts, even from his most intimate counsellors. The situation, in reality, is very grave, for the Italians, since the defeat of Garibaldi, have demanded, with increasing impatience, the evacuation of Rome; and the Ultramontanes, on their part, comprehending that the hour of the final crisis is approaching, redouble their intrigues and efforts to preserve for the Pope the protection of foreign bayonets.

It is interesting to examine, in a religious point of view, the two opposing parties which now contend for the preponderance in the mind and the decision of the Emperor.

The first of these parties is composed of ardent Romanists and timid Conservatives. At their head is the Empress Eugénie. I regret that her name should be mixed up in these quarrels; but it is becoming more and more notorious that this lady employs her high influence to maintain the temporal power of the Papacy. She is present at the discussions of the Council of Ministers when this question is debated, and fails not to take a direct part in their deliberations. Sometimes, also, in the private audiences which she grants to great political personages, she pleads warmly the cause of the Pope; she utters threats against his adversaries, or sheds tears. More than this, she maintains a private correspondence with Pius IX., through the medium of the Countess de Montebello, the wife of the General-in-Chief at Rome. In a word, Eugénie consecrates all her authority, and all her powers, to the work of seconding the pretensions of the Roman Court.

This fact ought not to surprise us. The Empress is a Spaniard by birth, she received anything but a liberal education in her younger years, and this, with the associations by which she is surrounded, has enabled the priests to acquire over her an incredible ascendancy. They have persuaded her that Napoleon III. will be eternally lost, should he cease to defend by arms the terrestrial sovereignty of the Roman pontiff; so that she recently said to an eminent statesman, who was indicating the possibility of a new attempt like that of Orsini, that she would rather see the Emperor perish by the bomb of an assassin, than behold him subjected to eternal damnation!!! Such is the depth of fanaticism to which Eugénie has descended, under the inspiration of the clergy!

In addition to the Empress, some members of the Cabinet, and a great number of senators and deputies, speak and act in the same sense. These are the men who fear lest their dignities and fortunes should be compromised. Many of them imagine that the fall of the temporal Papacy will be the commencement of a new demagogic revolution, and they raise their voices in favour of the Pontifical Court from a feeling of personal apprehension or self-interest.

Add to these eminent personages all the Romish bishops of France, the majority of the female sex amongst the middle classes, the thousands of ignorant devotees among the masses of the people, some distinguished writers, like MM. de Montalembert and de Broglie, who believe, in all sincerity, that the world would fall into chaos were Pius IX. despoiled of his territorial possessions. To this list must be further appended the numerous members of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul; and you will have some idea of the great strength of the reactionary party which demands the continuance of the French troops in the eternal city.

But the liberal party, on its side, displays much activity, and can allege better reasons to induce the Emperor to evacuate Rome. The most intelligent members of the Ministry, MM. Thouvenel, de Persigny, Fould, &c., cease not to demand that Italy should be put in possession of her natural capital. They have even more than once tendered their resignations, in the event of this question being indefinitely adjourned. The most accredited organs of the daily press put forth the same ideas. All agree in declaring that there is no reasonable arrangement to be hoped for from the Pope and the Cardinals; that the Roman Court is ungrateful, blind, incapable of comprehending the wants of modern civilisation; that it has rejected the wisest plans of conciliation by its perpetual non possumus; and that the citizens of Rome and of the Pontifical territory cannot be indefinitely deprived of their rights by the obstinate refusals of the Papacy. These liberals say also that the Emperor endangers his popularity, in allowing himself to be intimidated by the exigencies of the Jesuitical faction; that he cannot, in reason, prohibit to Rome the exercise of that popular sovereignty to which he owes his own crown; that by the occupation of the French troops he violates the principle of non-intervention embodied in the recent treaties of peace; that the Italians have shown enough of patience and of political qualifications to be free to do what they think good; that their long forbearance is exhausted; that the Roman question is, for Europe, a subject of incessant disquietude; and so on of the rest. You perceive that the liberal party is not wanting in excellent arguments for demanding the prompt recall of the French garrison.

Placed between these opposing influences, Napoleon III. meditates and hesitates. I believe that, in the depth of his heart, he inclines towards the solution most conformed to the wishes of the Italians; but he dares not declare himself in a categorical manner. Some of the journals announce that the Chamber of Deputies will shortly be dissolved. Should the general elections demonstrate that the majority of the French people desire the evacuation of Rome, the Emperor will be encouraged to accomplish it. In all contingencies, it is simply a question of time: the temporal power of the Pope has received a mortal wound, and no human aid can cure it.

ADDRESSES OF THE PRIESTS TO THE BISHOPS IN THE ECCLESIASTICAL RETREATS.

Meanwhile the bishops continue to employ all the means possible for increasing the public agitation. I have previously spoken of the great abundance of the episcopal letters, which, being read from the pulpits in the towns and villages, maintain and inflame the fanaticism of the multitude. At present the ecclesiastical retreats give to our prelates another opportunity of showing their zeal for the triumph of the Roman cause.

Some of your readers know, probably, what is meant by these ecclesiastical retreats in the discipline of the Papal Church. The priests, canons, vicars, and curates, of each diocese, meet together, at one fixed period of the year, in the chief seminary of the episcopal city, and there spend four or five days in various religious exercises. This institution, in certain respects, is a good one. To speak correctly, these are sacredotal, or pastoral conferences. It is desirable and advantageous that the poor curates of the country should, once a year, leave their hamlets, and meet their colleagues of the same diocese, for mutual instruction and edification. We find, in the works of the illustrious bishop and preacher, Massillon, several excellent exhortations which he addressed to the priests in these ecclesiastical retreats, under the name of synodal discourses.

But an old proverb says: "The corruption of the best thing is the worst." The bishops, being exclusively occupied with the preservation of the temporal Papacy, and thinking, apparently, that this interest is far more important than that of piety, have filled up the days allotted to the ecclesiastical retreats with vehement declamations on the Roman question. This is not all. They have invited the vicars and curates to sign addresses expressing their adhesion to the words and acts of the heads of the Pontifical Church, in the affair of the canonization of the Japanese martyrs. You will easily comprehend that such an invitation is an absolute command. "No priest," says a journal of Paris on this subject, "would dare to refuse his signature under present circumstances; for this refusal would compel him to seek the means of existence apart from the ecclesiastical ministry, since the refractory priest would be immediately deprived."

Nevertheless, the Ultramontane journals proclaim that the signatures appended to these addresses are spontaneous and free, and they extol, in high-flown terms, the perfect unity of Roman Catholicism. What a jest is this! The real truth is that, from the chief of the Papal hierarchy to its lowest grade, there reigns the system of passive obedience. It is military discipline applied to the sacerdotal body; just as, in an army, on a field of battle, the soldiers are subject to their captains, who, in their turn, must submit to the colonels, and these last to the generalissimo; so, amongst the Roman clergy, the simple priests must servilely bow their heads to the omnipotence of the prelates, who are themselves constrained to obey the word of command given by the Pope, or by the chiefs of the Jesuitical faction.

This system of passive obedience produces, without doubt, an external unanimity, which is imposing in its aspect, and may, in certain cases, exert a great influence on the progress of human affairs. We have a striking proof of this in the hesitation of the Imperial Government respecting the Roman question. But at what a price is not this artificial unanimity bought? Individuality, liberty, personal conviction, are mercilessly oppressed; and, consequently, there is, in the Papal system, under the appearance of strength, a source of weakness and of pain. When the characteristics of human nature are annihilated, what remains? The Protestant pastors are more divided, and sometimes they compromise their best undertakings by their disputes; but they are, at the same time, more independent and more strong. The work of God, which has established great diversities amongst men, is better respected; and it thence results that, at the end of a certain time, Protestantism obtains more brilliant victories than Romanism.

THE "OBSERVATEUR CATHOLIQUE" AND THE GALRICAN PARTY.

I have stated that almost all the priests obey blindly the injunctions of the bishops. There exist, however, some exceptions. I will mention a periodical miscellany entitled L'Observateur Catholique, which is by no means Roman Catholic. The ecclesiastics who publish this Observateur represent the old Gallican spirit; certain articles are even inspired by the strong convictions of that Jansenism which, in the seventeenth century, animated illustrious advocates such as Pascal, St. Cyran, and Arnauld. The editors of the Observateur Catholique point out, with as much reason as courage, the grave errors and abuses of existing Popery. They have, from the commencement, attacked the dogma, so new and so offensive, of the Immaculate Conception; and generally, they blame, in the name of the venerable traditions of the Fathers of the Church, the sacrilegious extension given to the worship of the Virgin Mary. They also loudly proclaim that the Pope has no need of territorial domains for the accomplishment of his spiritual mission. They have proved that the address signed at Rome by the 800 bishops is a political rather than a religious affair, and that it is based upon opinions which were never held by the ancient doctors. Recently the Abbé Duval inserted in the Observateur Catholique an article, in which, in energetic language, he reproached the cardinals and bishops for their display of a worldly luxury which had been disavowed by the first disciples of our Lord; and exhorted them to manifest less ostentation and more piety, less vanity and more zeal, less despotism and more devotion, &c. All this is well, and the courage of the editors of the Observateur Catholique deserves commendation. But what are the effects of their earnest protests? It must be owned that they amount to very little. At the outset, the priests who take part in the management of this paper were deprived of their ecclesiastical functions, and this brand, thus stamped on them by the bishops, casts discredit, beforehand, on the authority of their arguments. Moreover, it is difficult for Frenchmen to stop at the juste milieu; they willingly rush towards extreme opinions, particularly in matters of religion. One class is bigoted and fanatical, the other unbelieving and sceptical. The first denounce the Observateur Catholique as heretical and seditious; the second regard it as still too much imbued with the clerical spirit; so that these Gallican writers have not many readers. Their efforts, nevertheless, are not entirely without fruit; and when the French people shall more seriously study religious questions, they will better esteem the men who labour to reconcile the old national beliefs with the laws and tendencies of modern times.

MORAL STATISTICS OF FRANCE.

My former letter contained some remarks on the melancholy features of our contemporaneous literature (pp. 438, 439). I will continue this kind of information by now referring to the state of public and private morality in our country. I wish not to draw too dark a picture; the French have their good and amiable qualities, and indisputable progress has been made in the physical and intellectual condition of the labouring classes. But it would be false patriotism to conceal the defects and the moral miseries of our people. It is, on the contrary, important to show how the weakness of religious belief begets disorders of every kind, and I will borrow the following details from official documents.

M. Delangle, Minister of Justice, has published his periodical report on the number and the crimes of the offenders who have been tried before the judicial tribunals of the French empire. These statistics show that crimes against public order, or against the security and life of citizens, have diminished. On the other hand, attempts against chastity, shameful acts of gross and violent immorality, have increased in fearful proportions. From 1826 to 1830 they constituted only a thirteenth part of the crimes against persons; now they constitute a third part of such crimes! Many old men figure in this list of criminals. "Thus," says the Journal des Debats on this subject, "those crimes which presuppose at least some energy of character have diminished, but abject crimes, which call only for secrecy and cowardice—those which are the result of shameful vices, those which presuppose a depraved imagination, a polluted life, a corruption at once refined and gross—these crimes continue steadily to increase."

Infanticide has become more frequent. In vain does the departmental administration afford facilities to unfortunate and guilty women for confiding their children to public charity; these odious attempts continue to multiply, and often escape legal punishment; whence we must conclude that the detected and punished cases are far less numerous than those which are committed in secret.

An editor of the Journal of the Statistical Society of Paris, M. Hippolyte Blanc, has recently published some interesting researches upon suicide in France, from 1827 to the present time. From these documents it appears that the number of suicides goes on steadily increasing. In 1827 there was one suicide in 22,000 persons, now there is one in 12,000. "Suicide," says M. Blanc, "extends its ravages from day to day, without ever relenting. The increase, in fact, is about 1 per cent. every five years." Nearly 3,000 suicides are known to take place in France yearly, and you must note that the relations endeavour to conceal these acts from the police as much as possible. The real number of suicides is therefore greater. The female sex figures to the extent of but a fourth part of this gloomy list. Paris and the neighbouring departments furnish, proportionally, the greater number of names to the statistics of suicide.

These official statements may afford us salutary instruction. Men have learned to conquer matter; they possess steam engines, railroads, and electric telegraphs; and International Exhibitions prove that human industry has put forth marvellous developments; but morality and piety have no' advanced at the same pace with material progress, at least in our country. The thirst for worldly enjoyments requires money, and the necessity for rapidly making a fortune multiplies hazardous enterprises. These are the consequences of that materialism which reigns supreme in the different classes of society! How greatly, then, ought pious men—those who know evangelical truth—to increase in zeal and self-sacrifice, in order to proclaim the good news of salvation in Christ crucified to this people, who oscillate between the superstitions of Romanism and the negations of infidelity!

ERECTION OF A NEW PROTESTANT CHURCH AT PARIS.

The number of Protestants in Paris has greatly and rapidly increased. In the first years of this century the capital of France possessed only six pastors of the Reformed and Lutheran Churches, with three places of worship, and three services each Sunday. Now there are at Paris forty-eight pastors, of different denominations, thirty-one places of worship, eighty-three services every week (fifty-nine on Sunday, and twenty-four on other days)—of which forty-nine are in French, twelve in German, and twenty-two in English—without including meetings for prayer, Biblical instruction, and mutual edification, the total number of which may be estimated at fifty weekly. It is evident that new churches and chapels must be built, and I am glad to state that the Municipal Council of Paris has resolved to build a new religious edifice for the use of the Reformed Church, which shall contain from 1,000 to 1,200 persons, with two schoolrooms. It will be situated in the quarter of the Madeleine, one of the most-frequented districts of the capital. This is the first time that the civic treasury of Paris has been charged with the expense of such an erection; hitherto the churches set apart for our worship have been Romanist edifices belonging to the State. The Municipal Council, and the prefect of the department of the Seine, have shown, in this matter, feelings of goodwill which inspire us with gratitude.

PROTESTANT CHAPLAINS IN MEXICO.

Our religious journals have published extracts from letters written by Pastor E. Schmidt, Protestant chaplain in our army of Mexico. This excellent servant of the Gospel informs us that he has obtained from the military authorities all the facilities desirable for the discharge of his duties. He has distributed to each of the Protestant soldiers a copy of the New Testament, with an Almanac des Bons Conseils, and these books have been eagerly received. He has visited the sick of our communion in the hospital of Vera Cruz; and, which is remarkable, the only Romanist chaplain who had remained in that city, not being equal to the unassisted accomplishment of his own task, intreated M. Schmidt to visit some of his sick people. This is a token of brotherly confidence to which, from the priests, we are not much accustomed; but on this foreign soil rivalry disappears, and charity resumes its rights.

ITALY.

Florence, September 18, 1862.

THE GARIBALDIAN ENTERPRISE.

The excitement of the Garibaldian enterprise has passed away. It was intense while it lasted. The progress of the hero of Marsala was so rapid and unchecked, that for a moment the events of 1860 seemed about to be repeated. Honest men differed widely in their opinions, owing to the doubts entertained as to the connivance of the Government. The passion for Rome on the one hand, and the madness of the present exploit on the other, unless acquiesced in by men in authority, caused many a sound head to waver as to the issue. The greatest uncertainty prevailed until the finest troops of Italy, headed by the ablest captains, were poured into Sicily and Naples, leaving the frontier towards Austria for the time unprotected. It would appear that only then did Garibaldi himself believe in the serious opposition of the Ministry to his march upon Rome. He refused to fight the regular army of his country at Aspromonte, and was taken prisoner, and lies wounded at Spezzia. The people certainly believed he had a charmed life, but the nobility of his bearing when confronted with the soldiers of the King has endeared him more than ever to the Italian heart. Despite the unfavourable judgment as to his attempt to grasp the capital of Italy, his popularity never was greater than at this hour. Anything like a formal trial for treason, drawn out for several months of the winter, will be dangerous to the peace of the country. The more silent the Emperor of the French is as to the evacuation of Rome, the fonder becomes the attachment of the masses to their liberator. The longer the delay at Turin in securing the unity and independence of Italy, the more adored will be the only man who, rightly or wrongly, has dared to vindicate the claims of his fellow-countrymen to the City of the Seven Hills. It is well that a movement has been so happily checked which rejoiced in its rise and ongoing the friends of despotism and bigotry, but it has been brought about by means which have not strengthened the hands of royalty or good government. A state of siege is a sad expedient to adopt in a free country. The restrictions upon the liberty of the press, and the forfeiture of the right of association and the liberty of the subject, are costly sacrifices, whatever minor benefits may be momentarily obtained thereby. A feeling of sadness pervades all ranks. Hope is gone, and endless conjectures as to the future are rife. Unless some solution of the Roman question speedily takes place, the present lull will be but the calm which precedes the storm.

DEATH OF BISHOP CAPUTO.

Bishop Caputo, the only liberal member of the Italian episcopate, died lately in Naples, at the age of fifty-three. He was the senior chaplain of the King, president of the Association of Liberal Priests in Italy, and was much beloved in his diocese of Ariano. I had occasion last month to mention the confidence reposed in him by the Government, the opprobrious epithets with which he was designated at the late gathering of bishops in Rome, and the excellent appointments he made to the Royal chapels and monastery churches in the South, of which he was the patron. All honour was paid to the deceased dignitary on the occasion of his funeral; only a few Neapolitan canons and Capuchin monks refusing to join the priestly throng of mourners; but the deathbed was made the scene of violent wrangling on the part of the parish priest, who refused to administer the last sacraments to the dying man, unless he would recant his liberal views. The various efforts made for this purpose were fruitless, and, as the parochial functionary was deaf to all intreaty, a liberal priest, escorted by the national guard, was called in to perform the melancholy service. Even after life was extinct a high official of the Church insisted on an interview, and when assured that all was over, exclaimed bitterly, "We have lost our chance! we have lost our chance!" Proceedings have been instituted before the tribunals against the parish priest for refusing to discharge his duty.

THE ELBA, LUCCA, AND AREZZO MISSIONS.

Amid much obloquy and persecution, a little band of Christians continues to worship God according to their consciences in Rio, Island of Elba. The congregation numbers seventy-five communicants and many additional hearers. The young evangelist, Marchand, has during the last year borne every species of insult, and had stones thrown at him in the streets. Even when walking, one day, with Prince Napoleon and his suite, the rabble mingled cries of "Away with you!" among those of "Long live the Prince!" so that the evangelist was obliged to explain how matters stood to his Imperial Highness. This led to a few serious words with the French Consul and the Italian authorities, who have since befriended the evangelical flock, and lodged some of their more violent opponents in prison. There is no reasonable motive why the priests should hound on their devotees to such dastardly conduct, for while Mr. Marchand has betimes invited the priests to an honourable discussion, which they have constantly refused, he has confined himself in church to a simple declaration of the Gospel, which God has blessed abundantly. The congregation now contemplates the building of a modest church, with a schoolroom adjoining, in which their large day-school and Sabbath classes may meet conveniently. The whole expense will be 200*l*. I am sure that some of your readers will gladly aid the undertaking when I mention that the subscription-paper contains contributions amounting to 40*l*. by the poor fishermen of Rio themselves. A few Roman Catholics have given their mite willingly. A more gratifying document has seldom come into my hands, nor can a more commendable project be submitted to the sympathy of the Christian public. The building will belong to the Waldensian Church, of which Mr. Marchand is a student.

The mission in Lucca, a very bigoted city, though full of interesting souvenirs of the Evangelical Reform in the sixteenth century, has been of late put to great inconvenience. The old place of meeting was closed and barred against the evangelist by the landlord, who had received notice to quit the tenement from the proprietor, because he had let his rooms for conventicle purposes. A much better apartment, capable of containing 250 persons, having been found, and properly secured against proprietary interference, crowds of boys and men, paid for their services, have taken to injuring the doors and windows of the chapel, but the chief magistrate has given protection to the Evangelicals during the celebration of Divine worship, and 100 of them have fearlessly joined in the service. The Garibaldian movement and the Madonna festivities, however, led the delegate to beg a cessation of the meetings, as the unruly, on the one hand, might take occasion of the slightest disturbance to start a political demonstration, or the superstitious country folk who crowded the city might stir up the religious fervour of the populace; and in either case he had an insufficient force to preserve the peace. The evangelist lodged a protest, but consented, on the delegate fixing a time for the re-opening of the place of worship. Meanwhile the hall is being put in proper order and furnished.

The Arezzo mission is growing from a very small beginning. The difficulties thrown in the way of obtaining a place of worship have excited sympathy. The opposition of the priests has brought numbers of Roman Catholics to worship with the Swiss Protestants. Though spies are known to watch the proceedings, not a few Nicodemuses present themselves at early dawn or under cover of night. It is one of the most ignorant populations of Tuscany, and seems an unpromising field; but even on this poor soil, good fruit is being found.

ORDINARY COURSE OF EVANGELIZATION.

I mention particularly these three stations for the purpose of explaining that they exemplify the ordinary course of evangelization in Italy. On the arrival of an evangelist, the greatest difficulties are usually experienced in finding house-room or a preaching-hall. The underhand opposition which follows him in his efforts, the bigotry or fear of the priests on the part of landlords, is beyond all credence. Many a suitable place has to be given up; for as soon as the proprietor becomes acquainted with the purpose of his tenant, a speedy end is made to all arrangements.

When a locale has been secured, the audience is with difficulty brought in, for even when there are a few Evangelicals in the neighbourhood, numberless relations in their business, or family circle, or acquaintanceships, interfere to hinder them. The missionary goes on quietly toiling in faith, until the influence of his life and conversation begins to tell. The priests take the alarm; the town is infected with heresy; the churches resound with anathemas. Evil hour for the priests, for their indifferent hearers awake to an intense curiosity, and the meetings of the evangelist are crowded. If a colporteur is at hand, a good sale is effected, in the district, of Bibles and evangelical books. Whether or not controversy is indulged in, the preacher has increasing congregations, and, in the overruling providence of God, much good is effected. The physical force arguments to which the priests resort at this stage have no effect but to increase the numbers and intensify the curiosity; the more stir the greater the interest. After a period varying in length, however, the idle and curious fall away, and only the few serious and converted hearers remain firm. From this point dates the commencement of the real work. The evangelist is discouraged for a time, but is thrown back for comfort and strength, from any confidence in men or numbers, to the true source of spiritual power. The little flock gradually increases. Each fresh accession cheers and strengthens, and when the blessing of God has descended largely, the strong band of Christians, knit together in love and order, sets about the purchase, renting, or building of a suitable church, and gives of its substance for the poor and the maintenance of religious ordinances.

MR. MEYER AT ANCONA.

At Ancona, a rising seaport town on the Adriatic, Mr. Meyer has been very kindly received. In an incredibly short time he has acquired the language, and already conducts meetings among the natives. Among the Germans, his countrymen, and the Jews, to whom he is specially sent, as himself sprung from that interesting race, his work has begun auspiciously; while the few English families resident there have for the first time an opportunity of hearing the Gospel in their own tongue, and have gladly availed themselves of the privilege. An excellent sale of Bibles and religious books has taken place, and a Florentine convert at Pesaro, in the vicinity of Ancona, has gathered a goodly number of fellow-believers around him.

EVANGELIZATION IN NAPLES.

The schools still remain the chief feature of Neapolitan evangelization. They seem to have been well organised, and to be popular in the South. They have recently called forth the praise of those capable of judging, and who occupy the highest place in the national educational movement.

The Società, or largest evangelical meeting in Naples, is anxious for the regular teaching of a trained ministry, of which it stands greatly in need. Controversy and speculative theology have hitherto held too prominent a place, so that positive scriptural instruction is sought after, and a more formal Church-order than the present plan of simple introduction admits of.

LABOURS OF MR. PIGGOTT.

I ought not to omit reference to the energetic labours of Mr. Piggott, the young Wesleyan missionary who has recently adopted Italy as his field of labour. Previous to settling in Milan last spring, he established several very interesting réunions in the valley of Aosta, which still continue to be held among the peasantry in the small villages. In the capital of Lombardy he has begun a first-class boarding-school for Italian young ladies, in addition to Sabbath classes for English children. Northward, evangelists and colporteurs proceed to visit the Alpine lakes under his direction; while southward, a flourishing station at Parma, and efforts of various kinds in Bologna, Ferrara and Modena, attest his zeal and ability.

ABLE EVANGELISTS WANTED.

The crying want of Italy is an increase in the number of able evangelists, presently so small. The field is large, and the labourers are truly few. What is to be done? The Waldensian College, and the Academy of Dr. de Sanctis, at Genoa, are providing a steady supply, to which we must add several British and American Christians, who are devoting themselves to the North, and a few converted priests and lay agents employed in evangelization. But special efforts must be used to obtain suitable young men from the evangelical schools and churches to be trained through a regular course of study for preaching and pastoral labour. There is no doubt that here lies the solution of the difficulty we now experience in supplying old stations and breaking new ground in promising localities. Dr. Stewart, of Leghorn, has for several years been wisely occupied with a bursary scheme, for the purpose of educating young men for the ministry. Hitherto it has prospered and wrought well; but the claims are now so heavy, through the large number of young men presenting themselves, that I trust to see more of our wealthy laymen at home heartily subscribing to this effort. A missionary spirit is spreading among the younger students in the Valleys, who have till now been drafted off to commercial work in Turin and Genoa, and the teachers, both at Pomaret and La Tour, are fully alive to the influence they can exert upon their pupils in favour of the work of evangelization, so that the best material is in readiness. We are aware that Christian friends feel less strongly the appeals for aid to educational appliances than for the immediate purposes of evangelization and Bible-circulation; but we are strongly convinced that no nobler or more judicious outlay of Christian liberality can be made than in educating, through a course of years, an Italian ministry suited to the present wants, and ready for the future emergencies, of the country. Pious and humble labourers have done, and are doing, much good, intermingled, unfortunately, with much evil. It would be unprofitable to cite any of the amusing stories current as to the indignation of educated hearers through the ignorant Scripture criticisms and heterodoxies of some Italian evangelists.

PROTESTANT LITERATURE.

During the summer the Claudian press, the only evangelical one in Italy, has sent out a large number of books; among others, the "Anatomy of the Papacy," by Puaux, "Come to Jesus," "The Sinner's Friend," several works on the Sabbath, a series of Christian school-books, a volume of hymns, "The Holy Catholic Faith," specially prepared by the Rev. Newman Hall for Italian readers, and many smaller tracts and pamphlets. The New Testament has also been printed, without any interference from the authorities. The first volume of Dr. de Sanctis's theological work is about finished, and a series of books for children, such as "Matty Gregg" and the "Peep of Day," is in course of publication. The committee which superintends the press, now that the new roller machine is about to be set up, purposes several very valuable additions to Italian evangelical literature, among which may be mentioned a new edition of the Bible for the American Bible Society, a "Biblical Dictionary," a "Commentary on the Bible," the "Evidences of Christianity," by Bishop M'Ilvaine, stereotyped editions of "The Pilgrim's Progress," "Adieu to the Pope," Trivier's works, which are in great request among the people, as well as the reprinting of as much of the standard Puritan literature of the country as escaped the keen pursuit of the inquisitor three centuries ago, and the translation of the works of our best English divines and German reformers. For the circulation of our increasing stock there have been already established, as I gather from a circular printed for distribution, eight depôts in the chief towns of Italy, exclusive of the depôts for Bibles alone, to which must be added many smaller depôts in connexion with the missionary stations of the peninsula. As to the sale, it must be confessed that to an English eye, accustomed to London, Dublin, and Edinburgh enterprise, it is not large; but to those of us who have passed some time in Italy, and know the stagnation of spiritual life in the past, the progress made in the sale of these books, during the last three years, is wonderful, and encouraging in the extreme. Moreover, to those who judge—and there are few friends of this country who do not share the opinion with us—that a greater crisis is at hand than has yet dawned on Italy, and that the torpor of the masses is yielding to inquiry after the truth, there cannot be two opinions as to the preparation of a sound Christian literature. It is to the labours of a few men of faith and hope, years ago, that we owe the books presently circulating, and we trust that the issues of the Claudian press will be proportionally valuable in the future.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, September 15, 1862.

AN ECCLESIASTICAL REVOLUTION IN HANOVER.

I have to-day to refer to one of those ecclesiastical revolutions which, for some years past, have assumed in Germany a truly popular character, and which, more than anything else, illustrate the condition of the churches of this country. It is a catechism which, in the kingdom of Hanover, has been the occasion of one of these impassioned movements—one which has gone so far as to raise an émeute in the streets, and with which all the political and religious press is occupied. Such an affair can hardly be understood in England; but in Germany, where the catechism is the official book of religious instruction, used in all the schools, forming the basis of pastoral teaching for the entire youth, and even possessing the authority of a confession of faith—particularly in Hanover, where such a book is imposed on the whole country by Royal ordinance—it may be conceived that a book of this kind may become the occasion of a struggle like that which I must now, in few words, describe.

Since 1790 the Church of this country has been in possession of a catechism, which, without being Rationalistic, bore the impress of its epoch; that is to say, it but feebly set forth the special doctrines of Christianity. Within the last few years the revival of the orthodox belief, and a very marked tendency of the clergy towards ultra-Lutheranism, have caused to be felt the want of a catechism which might set forth these principles. The Consistory of Hanover, by means of a committee nominated for the purpose, adopted the smaller catechism of Luther, accompanied by an explanation conformed to the spirit of the present epoch; a Royal ordinance then imposed the book on all the schools and all the churches of the country.

These facts alone will have sufficed to show you that the State Church system reigns absolutely in Hanover, as in most of the countries of Germany. If the people were dissatisfied with the book thus imposed on them, they had no legal means of manifesting their wishes, and were shut up to an opposition inevitably invested with an irregular character. This is what has happened. The liberal journals commenced the attack by a criticism of the new catechism, and they had not much difficulty in arousing hostility amongst the greater portion of the public, by insinuating a multitude of prejudices against a book by which, they said, it was sought to bring back youth to superannuated doctrines, if not to Catholic principles. Thence arose a universal and prolonged agitation, nourished by the disaffection of a great part of the people towards the orthodox clergy, and inflamed by the journals, as also by several public meetings. In this state of feeling a pastor (Baureschmidt), having written a tract against the catechism, was summoned to appear before the Consistory, and nothing more was needed to make him the hero of the day. They compared him to Luther making his entry into Worms, and, on his leaving the place of audience, multitudes received him with the most exciting ovations. These multitudes, however, did not stop here, they attacked with volleys of stones the house of a principal member of the Consistory; and this brutal excitement ended with several days of émeutes in the streets, which could only be suppressed by the military! What was to be done? All the High Church party desired that the Government should persist in its resistance, and have the catechism imposed by sheer force upon a people who rejected it. But the King, yielding to more sensible counsels, and to the petitions with which he was assailed, ended the matter by promulgating a new ordinance, by which he left to the parishes the free choice of accepting or rejecting the new catechism—a great triumph for the liberal party, and a humiliating defeat for the clerical party! But all is not yet finished by this proceeding, for now the struggle is pursued in several parishes between the orthodox pastors and their flocks.

What can be the true causes of these strange popular agitations which, within the last few years, have so often recurred in Germany in connexion with religious questions? The true cause, reply some, is the unbelief of the people, and their hatred of the vital doctrines of Christianity. The true cause, say others, is opposition to the clerical party of the pastors. It is, say a third party, a means of making political resistance under the mantle of religion. It is further, according to others, a routine sort of attachment among the people to their own religious customs. All these causes may, in effect, operate simultaneously in different classes of society.

For ourselves, what we especially see in these popular movements is something beyond all this: it is the revival of liberty of conscience, too long oppressed by an ecclesiastical system which takes no account of it, but which always re-awakens with all the other liberties in a nation. This it is which has been made evident by the analogous movements of which we have been witnesses in Bavaria, in the Grand Duchy of Baden, in the palatinate of the Rhine, and in several countries under the empire of Austria. The same people who submit to legal authority in matters civil and political have come to feel that no one has a right to impose on them their faith and their worship by Royal ordinances. What proves this the more clearly is, that all the governments themselves, feeling that conscience has rights superior to theirs, have yielded, in presence of these popular movements, which they certainly would not have done if the question had been the observance, even by direct force, of the duties of citizens. Thus is being overcome by the power of events the fearful fusion still existing in Germany between the temporal and the spiritual, between politics and religion, between the State and the Church. We may lament, with the orthodox party, the enmity which is manifested by the majority towards the true Gospel; but we cannot, like that party, regret that the civil power should renounce compulsion in religious matters, being convinced that compulsion destroys faith and conscience too. Never will genuine religious life exist, except in connexion with liberty. The Gospel of the grace of God in Jesus Christ, freely proclaimed, as in apostolic times, will reproduce the same marvels of Christian life, provided that there be not mixed up with it the decrees of cabinets, nor the decisions of clerical authority.

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING OF THE GUSTAVUS-ADOLPHUS SOCIETY.

The annual general meeting of the Gustavus-Adolphus Society, which has just been held at Nuremberg, has been of a very jubilant character, alike in respect of the number who were present, the reported results of the labours of the year, and the conviction, universally experienced, that this first meeting in the kingdom of Bavaria would inaugurate a new era for Protestantism. This conviction was the more strongly felt because of the presence of Austrian delegates, who announced that they also now had liberty to found branch societies in their own country, notwithstanding the name of Gustavus-Adolphus, which had hitherto been proscribed there. The general work is progressing. The receipts have exceeded by one-third those of last year, and the assistance rendered to all the poor churches which entreated the aid of the society has been increased in the same proportion. It was not without enthusiasm that the meeting was enabled to vote a special donation of 8,000 thalers towards the church at Salzburg, now rebuilding from the ruins in which it was left by the atrocious persecutions so well known to all. That which makes us love the Gustavus-Adolphus Society, notwithstanding its imperfections, is the fact that, more than any other, it reanimates in Germany the spirit of the Reformation and all the great recollections of the victories and the sufferings of the Protestant Christians.

This new life is very desirable at a time in which Catholicism is making efforts, worthy of our emulation, to re-conquer in Germany the ground which it has lost.

MEETING OF THE CATHOLIC SOCIETIES.

Whilst the Gustavus-Adolphus Society was holding its session at Nuremburg, the different Catholic religious societies held their annual gathering at Aix-la-Chapelle. Animated discourses were delivered there, in which we are bound to recognise a certain moderation in respect of Protestantism; ardent wishes, too, were there expressed for the deliverance of the Pope, and the re-establishment of his temporal power. What we think of more importance, however—even in the interests of Catholicism—is the religious and moral good which these societies strive to do amongst the poor and working classes of the Catholic populations. But is it not melancholy that an assembly comprising within itself many intelligent men, of high position, should not know better than to combine the grossest superstition with their efforts of zeal and of charity? At Aix-la-Chapelle there was, in fact, one day devoted to the exhibition of the famous relics preserved in that city; where, amongst other things, they show the shirt of St. Joseph, and the swaddling clothes of the infant Jesus! Who shall say in how many men's minds all religious conviction may not be stifled by such juggleries, which they confound with faith? O Catholic brethren, you have Jesus Christ and His eternal divinity, which your Church has never denied; His work of redemption and of love accomplished on the cross. Show this to the people in its majestic beauty, and they will recognise their Saviour, but leave these swaddling clothes buried in the lie which has discovered them.

BRITISH AMERICA.

PROSELYTISM AT THE DEATHBED.

Canada West, August, 1862.

A recent occurrence of pretended conversion to the Church of Rome in this country is not unlikely to be made a good deal of in European publications favourable to Romanism, as being that of a man of some public notoriety. You will perhaps be glad to have a condensed statement of the facts for your readers. In Canada (Western at least) Romanists can make nothing of it, the public mind condemning the audacity of the pretence. But far away, of course, it can be made to tell, that one of the most noted politicians, a high officebearer, was received into the Romish Church on his deathbed.

Sir Allan McNab had made himself conspicuous on the loyal side, twenty-five years ago, during the insurrectionary movements in this country, and especially against the sympathisers on the American side, who planned expeditions into Canada; he has ever since been a prominent member of the Legislature, held high office, and during the last session of the Provincial Parliament presided as Speaker over the Legislative Council (the Canadian Upper House). He was a professed member of the Church of England, and of the congregation of Christ Church, in Hamilton, the place of his residence, under the ministrations of the Rev. J. G. Geddes, a very respectable and assiduous High Churchman. His wife was a Roman Catholic, and died some years ago; her daughters were brought up in the mother's faith; a sister-in-law of the same religious persuasion kept house for him; and his own Protestantism was of that kind which allowed him to let all these near connexions go, unwarned by him, their own way, while he himself adhered to the Church in which he had been brought up, uninterfered with by them, apparently. He had vigour of mind and flow of spirits enough, while in health, to discourage any attempt—if such were ever made—at bringing him over to another persuasion. He also had two sisters living in Hamilton, members of the Church of England. While it may well be doubted whether his profession was founded upon deep convictions and a sense of the value of evangelical truth, there is no reason for supposing that he had the slightest leaning towards the Church of Rome. He had sufficient understanding to despise its superstition and to abhor the imposture of its deathbed conversions.

Sir Allan received the Lord's Supper with the congregation in Christ Church, in June last, and generally worshipped with them, when at home, up to Sunday, the 20th of July. Towards the end of that month he was taken ill. On Monday, the 4th, and Tuesday, the 5th of August, he received the pastoral visits of his clergyman, Mr. Geddes, who had no reason to think him in any immediate danger then, but on Thursday hastened to the house, having heard that the patient was much worse. Then Rome began to show itself. Three times on that day the dying man's pastor called, and, on some plea or other, was not permitted to see him. On Friday morning he called again, without waiting for his breakfast, because he heard that Sir Allan was dying, but still sensible. He then learnt that on the previous day the Roman Catholic bishop and a prie had been admitted to the sick chamber, and had received Sir Allan into their Church. Mr. Geddes, however, made his way to the dying man's bed, found him conscious, ascertained that he knew him, and asked, after several other questions, "Do you desire to die in the pure and Reformed faith of the Church of England?" To which Sir Allan replied earnestly and distinctly, "That's what I do." A scene ensued: the Romish sister-in-law, and another lady of the same persuasion, offered up Romish prayers, but the clergyman still had an opportunity of reading the commendatory prayer out of the Prayer-book service for visiting the sick. The Romish bishop and priest came to administer extreme unction, but the Rector of Christ Church was in possession, and manfully maintained the field; neither bishop, nor priest, nor Romish lady, could induce him to yield the ground to them. While the war of tongues went on in the hall outside the room—the door open, so that Mr. Geddes could see what was going on within—the spirit fled.

A question of law arose, whether the Anglican clergyman could insist upon the right of performing the funeral service over the deceased, which the Protestant sisters desired; but the decision given by a legal gentleman in attendance on the day of the funeral was, that the Romish sister-in-law had authority in the house and on the ground where the deceased had a family burying-place. She was backed, I am sorry to say, by a brother of hers, who still professes to be a member of the Church of England, and her directions were complied with. A very large number of persons from Hamilton itself and from other parts of the country had assembled to show respect to the remains of a man of so much note in public life; but when it was announced that the Romish bishop was to perform the funeral rites, nearly all of them withdrew. The feeling was general that the pretended conversion was a gross imposture.

The Rev. Mr. Geddes published his statement, confirmed by Sir Allan's two sisters and one of the doctors. The Romish bishop has printed his counter statement. Now the questions of fact involved in the matter are these: Was Sir Allan conscious, and a consenting party, on Thursday morning, when the bishop, as he says, confessed and received him into the Church of Rome? It was the time when the sister-in-law contrived to prevent Mr. Geddes from seeing him, and when three doctors were in consultation respecting him, and from them no declaration has come forth. The other question, Was he conscious on the following morning, when he declared to Mr. Geddes that he desired to die in the pure and reformed faith of the Church of England? This is testified to by Sir Allan's two sisters and Dr. Craigie, a good old Scotch Presbyterian. More evidence will probably be forthcoming by and by; that is, of the servants who were present, who would like to have their arrears of wages first paid to them out of Sir Allan's deeply-involved estate before they make themselves obnoxious to their paymasters by speaking out upon what they have witnessed.

Bishop Farrel's statement contains the following paragraph, which is not a little illustrative of Romish practice:—

"I shall now proceed to state the facts which relate to the conversion of the deceased. Several months ago, while Mr. Daley, afterwards Sir Allan's son-in-law, was on a visit to the Castle, I, with my vicar-general, the Very Rev. E. Gordon, dined with Sir Allan and his family. In the course of the afternoon of that day, whilst walking on the grounds in front of his house, Sir Allan stated to me, in the presence of my vicar-general, his intention of dying a Roman Catholic. After this statement no one will be surprised at my taking a particular interest in his last moments—as my belief in the Athanasian Creed is practical, that without the true Catholic faith no one can be saved."

Now the marriage of Sir Allan's daughter took place eleven months ago; so far back, then, the dinner and conversation here referred to; and the bishop, professing to have obtained the statement of such an intention from a professed member of the Church of England, shows that he laid it up in his memory—that was enough—as a matter which gave him "a particular interest" in this hopeful convert's "last moments." The bishop does not even profess that he took the least pains to urge upon Sir Allan the duty of an immediate decision in a matter of so much importance. No, no; you go on in your feigned profession of the Protestant faith; you will do our work by means of the position you hold in the country, which might be imperilled by a change of your faith. I have sentinels about you, who will not fail to call me in at the opportune moment, and to keep out your Protestant pastor, and then we will make everything right. What Protestant minister—be he Anglican, Presbyterian, Methodist, or Congregationalist—would venture to avow such a course as this, in the case of a Romanist expressing his purpose of becoming a Protestant before he dies? Should we not all cry out against him, "How could you allow this soul to comfort itself with the purpose of a future change, without urging upon it at once the peril of delay, and the duty of acting up to convictions, regardless of consequences?" No censure of that kind is anticipated by the Papist; he makes up his story (for I confess myself incredulous on the subject altogether), which upon his own showing condemns both bishop and vicar-general as having tacitly sanctioned a man's hypocritical continuance in full communion with the Church of England, while he avowed his conviction that, in order to be safe, he must die in communion with the Church of Rome; and as having spun their web about him, so as to be sure of having him in their grasp before the breath went out of him. What an episcopate! what a priesthood! what a faith!

CHINA.

The following communication is from the pen of one of the missionaries of the American Board :—

Fuh-Chau, China, July 14, 1862.

AN IMPERIAL PROCLAMATION.

A proclamation from the prefect was recently posted in the city and suburbs, in favour of converts to Romanism. It is one of the many reflections from the Imperial throne which at the present time "illumine the Central Land," betokening "grace" to "outside nations." It is so instructive in some respects, that I send it to you in a condensed form :—

"Ting, the Prefect of the Fuh-Chau department, issues this plain proclamation, in obedience to a communication from the commissioners and intendants, embodying the commands of his Excellency Kung, the Viceroy. On the 19th of the first month of the present year an Imperial commission was appointed to supervise the official matters of all nations, which instituted an examination into the French treaty made at Tientsin, in the eighth year of Hien-Fung. In the thirteenth section of said treaty it is written: 'All the people of our Middle Kingdom who wish to embrace the doctrine of the Lord of Heaven [i.e., Romanism], must not be prevented; such persons are to enjoy freedom from oppression; moreover, all previous proclamations prohibiting said religion are hereby annulled.' Again, on the 2nd of the eleventh month of the present year the Imperial will was received, commanding that 'hereafter, in all that concerns the embracing said religion, all local magistrates must investigate the root of the matter, and do justly. If those embracing the religion are peaceful and virtuous, they shall still be regarded as our people, and shall be loved equally with those not embracing said religion. Most positively there must be no severe exactions. The local officers in every case must be just, and govern with such discrimination as to display their extreme desire to tranquillise the good. Respect this.' . . . Moreover, the religion of Heaven's Lord essentially exhorts men to make the doing good a main thing. Its grand idea is identical with that of Buddhism, Taoism, and Confucianism. Hereafter its converts have nothing to do with idol processions, burning incense, theatricals, &c. They must never be compelled to contribute fees [for such purposes]. Besides, the Central Land has sincere amity with France, and must treat her with a liberality even not strictly due, in order to deepen the friendly alliance. Henceforth, if the preachers of said religion [i.e., the Romish priests] appear before the local magistrates, by petition or by accusation, and have a good cause, said magistrates shall by no means exact fees from them. . . . The Viceroy sends these orders to the high officers, to communicate to the prefect. Now

I, the prefect, on receiving these orders, besides informing the district magistrates, forthwith issue this plain proclamation for the information of all classes of the people. There must be mutual friendship between the Romish converts and people at large; and when local idol processions, theatricals, incense-burning, &c., occur, inasmuch as said converts are not willing to take part in them, their convenience, of course, must be consulted, and they must be excused from paying the fees. If any, relying on their own overbearing natures, use oppression [against the converts], when I shall have thoroughly sifted the matter, they shall certainly be punished. Let every one fear and obey. Transgress not this special proclamation. Given in this first year of Tungchi, fifth month, eighth day."

POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The above proclamation explains itself very well. The Chinese Government is now apparently resolved to avoid occasions of collision with foreign nations. The interpretation and application of the "favoured nation clause" in the treaties will undoubtedly secure the same immunities for Protestant converts as those guaranteed to Romanists. It is true that in days of old, Chinese edicts meant nothing; but now we verily believe a new era has dawned on Chinese policy. There are some shrewd men connected with the Imperial Government at Pekin. Prince Kung and his advisers probably see that the prosperity of the land, not to say the very existence of their Government, is involved in foreign relations. This growing conviction, and the policy based on it, are none the less real and important because stimulated and energised by a foreign element. Providence wills it that British and French power and diplomacy should infuse life and principles amazingly liberal for a heathen nation into this Government. We see something most intensely Napoleonic cropping out in such edicts, as well as in the claims now being urged here by the French to an important heathen temple, &c. Napoleon says, "This temple was once the property of my priests. I can prove it; and I must have it, according to treaty." Very well; let the heathen work, and in due time religious toleration, enforced executively as well as by legislation, will emerge from the process. Then Protestantism and Romanism will have a fair field with idolatry, and by God's grace the first will conquer both the others.

In reading the above proclamation you must not suppose that Romanism is, in an exclusive sense, asserted to be the same with the native religions. All Chinese are fond of saying that our doctrines are essentially the same with theirs. "You teach men to be good; so do Buddha and Laotse and Confucius. You worship Jesus, we worship the Pearly Emperor; but the li [essential principle] of our religions is the same."

PROGRESS OF MISSIONARY WORK.

We are progressing in our work. Out-stations have been occupied, where the blessed Gospel is constantly preached. A new position has been secured within the city walls, which have so long been as ramparts unsuccessfully besieged. Converts are being multiplied, many of whom at least seem to be steadfast in the faith. And now what is our great want? It is the Holy Spirit of God to descend in Pentecostal power on the hearts of the missionaries, the members of our infant churches, and the people who hear our message. Probably the day is not far distant when the people of Christendom will "see eye to eye" in reference to China. Ere long the tide of prayer will bear to the Throne of Grace the interests of this great people more earnestly, and then the current of effort will set in more strongly and successfully.

MADAGASCAR.

LETTERS FROM MR. ELLIS.

The Directors of the London Missionary Society have received by the last mail from the Mauritius very gratifying communications from the Rev. William Ellis, dated Antananarivo, July 2.

The Rev. Robert Toy and his companions arrived safely at Mauritius on the 15th July. They sailed for Madagascar on the 5th August, and probably reached Tamatave within two or three days, and proceeded without delay to the capital.

Mr. Ellis left Tamatave for the capital on May 31, the journey occupying fifteen days. Thirty miles from the capital he was met by a large number of Christians from Antananarivo. The two pastors who were with them said they were sent by their brethren and the Churches to bid him welcome, assure him of the general joy which his arrival would produce, and bear him company to the capital. He thus describes his RECEPTION AT THE CAPITAL.

The next morning the officers delivered a letter from the King, and another from the Principal Secretary of State, bidding me welcome, and informing me of the King's wish that I should enter Antananarivo that day. Soon after nine o'clock we set out, quite a large company, for each officer had his palanquin-bearers and attendants, and we were not less than 200 persons. About two we reached the suburbs, and I was greeted by multitudes gathered in their courtyards, and on the walls, as I passed along, till I reached a very comfortable house, which the King had appointed for my residence, not far from the palace. The King and Queen, and the nobles of the court, received me with great friendliness and pleasure at the palace the next day, and expressed themselves gratified with my communications respecting the friendship of the English, the interest taken in their welfare, and the endeavours the society were making to aid in extending the blessings of Christianity and education, as the best means of promoting the permanent welfare of the people. Mentioning the number and specific objects of the several missionaries on their way to Madagascar, with the supply of books, school materials, and printing apparatus, which they would bring, both King and Queen thanked me for the communication I had made, and requested me to assure their friends that it was peculiarly gratifying to them. The Prime Minister, the Commander-in-Chief, the first officer of the palace, and other high authorities, some of them apparently most earnest Christians, were equally cordial in their welcomes, and in their conferences with me at their own residences, in which I have been their guest. For more than a week my house was continually thronged with Christian friends from different parts of the capital, or from Christian families from the numerous villages in the suburbs, all expressing their joy at my arrival.

Mr. Ellis then proceeds to speak of the

CHERRISHING PROSPECTS OF THE MISSIONARIES.

The chief disappointment the people feel arises from my having no copies of the Scriptures. They had learned by my letters from Mauritius that I was coming alone, and that the missionaries were to follow; but they expected, and most urgently do they need, the Holy Scriptures. In some entire congregations there is not a copy, and they only hear them read when a minister or friend from the capital comes to them; and yet their faith is simple, scriptural, and firm; no deviation in their teaching or belief from the great essential truths of the Gospel; no visionary or erratic opinions on the subject of religion, which seems to be with them a simple, sincere, earnest, personal concern.

I have been two Sabbaths in the capital, and have attended two of their places of worship—rustic, temporary buildings—houses enlarged by taking out the ends and forming two or more together, and taking down the front wall, and spreading out a screen of rushes. At Analakely more than 1,500 were present, and scarcely fewer at Amparimbe. These places are filled soon after daybreak on Sunday, and continue crowded, with not more than an interval of a couple of hours, till five in the afternoon; not, indeed, with the same audience, but with successive congregations. On each of the Sabbaths I have taken part in these services, reading the Malagasy Scriptures, delivering a short discourse in broken Malagasy, but in which the pastors encourage me by saying they understand it, and the people are glad. I also pray partly in English, and partly in Malagasy. No description can convey to you any correct idea of the seriousness, attention, apparent devotion, and deep feeling of these assemblies during the time of worship. Some of the pastors are with me every day; but we have not been able to hold a general meeting yet, though they greatly desire it.

I am occasionally sent for by the King or some of the high officers, and I have for some short time past attended the King at his house daily, from one to three o'clock, to read English with him. We read together out of a large quarto Bible, on the outside of which is inscribed in gilt letters, "Presented to Radama, King of Madagascar, by the London Missionary Society, 1821." A number of officers, some of them Christians, are generally present, and we frequently converse on what we have read. I have also every forenoon at my house eleven or twelve sons of the chief nobles and officers, who come to learn English an hour and a-half daily. They will be the future rulers of the country. They accompany me to the chapel, and sometimes to my readings with the King. Last Sunday, with his Majesty's approval, I held Divine service at the King's house at three o'clock in the afternoon. His Majesty, some of his high officers, all my pupils, and a number of others, were present. I read in the Old and New Testament; we sang twice, I prayed, partly in English and partly in Malagasy, concluding with the Lord's Prayer in Malagasy, and occupied about a quarter of an hour in an address from 1 Tim. i. 15—"This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." This was faithfully translated by Ra Haniraka. All were very attentive. I was informed that the King expressed his approval, and I hope to be permitted to continue the service. I have seen nothing yet to diminish the high opinion I had formed of the strength and purity of the religious feeling among the people.

We must not conclude that all are genuine converts; but I believe future years will prove that many are walking in newness of life and spiritual fellowship with Christ. The Christians are indeed numerous, for they may be counted by thousands in the land. Still, they are only a minority in the general population, and this probably operates favourably in stimulating them to watchfulness, earnestness, and sincerity in their profession of Christianity.

I have applied for, and have obtained from the King, the ground on which Mr. Griffiths' house and school formerly stood (both were burnt), and also the ground on which the printing establishment stood.

THE ROMANISTS—ASSISTANCE AND PRAYER REQUESTED.

There are a number of Roman Catholic priests, and some Sisters of Charity, here, and more are very shortly expected; but scarcely any of the people attend their services. The attachment of the people to the Bible—their only light, support, and friend, during the long night of persecution which has just passed away—together with the remembrance of former times when their eyes saw their teachers, are undoubtedly among the chief causes of the strong desire for, and confidence in, the English Protestant missionaries whom they are expecting.

The Christians will want much assistance, for the widows and orphans are many; and the losses and sufferings of twenty-six years, during parts of which many of them had not where to lay their heads, has not left them many resources, and they anxiously and confidently look to England for help. Four churches must be built over the conspicuous spots on which the martyrs died, and they will be occupied by many who were their companions in the faith and tribulation of the Gospel of Christ.

I ask on behalf of the young but vigorous churches, and the outlying and unconverted multitudes of the Malagasy, the fervent and continued prayers of the churches at home.

NEW ZEALAND.

A minister actively engaged in efforts for the good of those around him addresses to us a letter, the greater portion of which we subjoin:—

Otago, June 18, 1862.

THE GOVERNOR AND THE ROMAN CATHOLICS.

A controversy arose some time since between the friends of the Bible Society and the Roman Catholic Bishop, in consequence of Sir Thomas Brown, the Governor of New Zealand, having presided at a Bible meeting, when a report was read in which the Roman Catholics were called "Papists," and represented as opposing the circulation of the Word of God. The Bishop (Pompallier) published a letter to the Governor, breathing an intensely Ultramontane spirit, and complaining both of the "sectaries" and the Governor, to which his excellency replied in an apology, remarking that he knew nothing of the contents of the report till it was read in the meeting, and that he objected to any portion of the community being reflected on in the manner complained of. The Bishop thanked him, and sent him a Roman Catholic catechism.

ARRIVAL OF ROMISH PRIESTS.

During the past year the Propaganda have sent out nineteen priests, chiefly French and Italian, who are now located among the natives of these and other South Sea Islands, and it has been frequently mooted here that these emissaries have much to do with the difficulties in governing the natives of New Zealand; according to the remark of Napoleon to one of his generals on entering Spain, "Believe me, general, countries where priests abound are easily disturbed."

CONDITION OF THE NATIVE POPULATION.

The natives to the north of Auckland are in danger of rather a serious intertribal war, a quarrel having ensued respecting land, and five being killed and eight wounded already in battles. The Government is, however, in no way involved in this unhappy affair at present.

At the Waikato, where the main native population have their lands, and where the Maori King makes a sham of governing, there is strong opposition to Sir George Grey's truly Christian and philanthropic measures for the administration of justice, the promotion of education, and advance of civilisation; and the missionaries have great cause for anxiety and concern on behalf of their people, so many of whom are infatuated with the charm of becoming a distinct nation, with their own sovereign and laws; and certainly a more proper case for prayer on the part of all Christians and churches can hardly exist than that of the New Zealand native congregations and their much-tried missionaries.

I was, some months since, one of three ministers on a tour of three weeks among them, to admonish them to peaceful and industrial pursuits; but they seemed bent upon their own course, and regarded the ministers as servants of the Government, to whom they seemed everywhere resolved not to submit. We visited the "King," who occupied a hut which cost twenty pounds in building, and saw the tomb of the late King, "Potatow," which cost a similar sum. One of us prayed with the dirty old man as he sat on the earth floor, and another administered to his bodily ailments. It is indeed melancholy to see how the poor people are misled from their upward course by this perfect caricature of nationality and self-government.

FRATERNAL INTERCOURSE BETWEEN PRESBYTERIANS AND WESLEYANS.

The Presbyterians have been settled here from the commencement of the colony, and the Church of England has had a minister and a small church for a few years past. The Wesleyans have only come to Otago during the last three months, and already a handsome church, to seat 500 persons, is nearly completed, at a cost of 1,500*l.*, most of which is raised in the town by free contribution. The Church of Scotland has manifested a most cordial and brotherly feeling towards the Wesleyans in their entrance into among them. As they have no place of their own in which to worship, "Knox Church," seating 1,000 persons, is placed at their service every Sabbath evening, and at a tea-meeting on behalf of the new building, Dr. Burns gave the use of his church, and took the chair on the occasion, speaking of the thankful recollections he entertained of the hearty liberality of the Wesleyan people in Great Britain twenty years ago, at the time of the disruption, in aid of the funds for establishing the "Free Church" of Scotland; while the Wesleyan minister mentioned the pleasure he felt in coming among his own people at that period, near London, in company with two Scotch ministers, in raising among them contributions for that purpose; and now his pleasure was doubled by receiving so full a reward at a place and time so remote from the hands and hearts of the same "Free Church," now become strong and flourishing at the ends of the earth.

Upon the whole, there is a good prospect of earnest churches of the Lord Jesus growing up into strength and magnitude in these lands, sufficient to command the respect of the population, and united as cordially in evangelical faith and Christian zeal as are the most enlightened of their fathers and brethren of the home countries. A goodly share of their sympathy and prayers will be highly valued by the missionaries and people of both races in New Zealand.

POLYNESIA.

THE PROTESTANT CHURCHES IN TAHITI.

British Christians will ever cherish a feeling of the deepest interest in the welfare of their brethren of Tahiti, who cling to the pure doctrines of the Gospel, notwithstanding the allurements of the Church of Rome, backed by influence which can make itself powerfully felt upon their secular concerns. After what they have undergone, the following communication, from the resident Protestant missionary, must be regarded as of a decidedly hopeful character:—

Papeete, Tahiti, May 17, 1862.

CHURCH AND STATE.

Religion here, as in France [the protecting Power], is placed under the control of the State. All the ministers of the native churches are supported by the State. A certain sum also is voted by the parent country for the support of the Catholic Mission, and out of this sum the salary of an European, formerly a member of the London Missionary Society, is paid, as the head of the native Protestant Churches—which is called the National Church. It is only right to say that.

while the Government requires obedience to its regulations from the native preachers, it does not interfere with the doctrines they teach.

THE NATIVE MINISTRY.

There are about thirty native preachers, a few of whom received a limited amount of training prior to their being appointed to office, but the large majority of them had no special preparation, and are very deficient in knowledge. Notwithstanding this, it is matter for much thankfulness that their knowledge of the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel is clear, and by the aid of commentaries on some of the books of Scripture, and the outlines of sermons furnished to them in their own language, they are kept from the adoption of any anti-scriptural doctrines, although they are often astray in the exposition and application of many passages of Scripture. The press, however, is still at work, and will continue to be so until an exposition of the whole Bible is placed in their hands.

So sensible are they of their deficiencies, and so desirous of removing them, that nearly two years ago the native Legislative Assembly solicited from the French Government two French Protestant ministers to be sent here—one to instruct the pastors, and to train up others for the sacred office, and the other to train teachers for the schools. To this application no answer has been returned, but a body of the society of "Freres Ploermel" have arrived, and are doing their utmost to make Roman Catholics of all the children who are placed under their care. No reply has been received to the application made, so that the petitioners are still in doubt as to the issue.

POLICY OF THE GOVERNORS—A POPISH BUGBEAR.

The Governors who have been sent to Tahiti have invariably shown a strong disposition to give liberty of action in religious matters; but the same party that restrains the progress of the great blessing in Europe has been at work here from the commencement of the protectorate, and increases in vigour as time advances. This is the power in use in Tahiti, which, however glaringly untrue, is professedly believed by many in authority. It is this: "That Protestantism represents the British influence in Tahiti, and Catholicism that of France; consequently, to make Tahiti fully French it must become entirely Catholic." While every thoughtful man laughs at this as one of those ruses which a certain party have accustomed themselves to use for ages, whereby to accomplish their purposes, many appear to believe in the truth of it, and the "Influence Anglaise" is spoken of continually as some invisible imp going about the country to keep back the natives from loving their protectors; while the truth is, and everybody here knows it, that those natives who have become Catholics are the least subject to the civil authority of any others, and take refuge under the influence of their teachers. I will only add, that those who have fabricated this bugbear, and who industriously keep it before the minds of those whose actions it may influence, have such a secret and extensive power in the various departments of the Home Government, that they can retard or hasten the advancement of any one who is seeking promotion.

SPIRITUAL CONDITION OF THE TAHITIAN PROTESTANTS—AN INTERESTING SERVICE.

These facts show with what power Protestantism has to contend here to keep up its existence. Subtle and powerful, however, as this influence is, God has not forsaken His work in Tahiti. The number of communicants is equal to the best days of religious profession; and although seasons of coldness occur, the warmth of spiritual life again returns. About the close of last year I was anxious to find a few young men to send to our institution for training native pastors, held on the island of Tahaa, one of the leeward group of islands; but my search was unsuccessful. But as the year closed I was invited to spend the last Sunday in the year, and the close of the old and the opening of the new year, in a district some distance from home. Having obtained the proper permission from the French Governor to go (as on every occasion I am compelled to do before I can preach or pray in a native chapel in the Tahitian language), I went and preached to a large congregation. At the close of the morning service I administered the ordinance of the Lord's Supper to a large body of communicants, many of whom had come from the neighbouring districts. On the eve of the new year we met again at eight o'clock, to the number of about 800. From nine to twelve o'clock was spent in prayer and exhortation. Twelve short addresses were given, and an equal number of prayers were offered up, the appropriateness and point of which were truly interesting. Ten minutes were then spent in silent prayer, until the chapel bell tolled twelve, a hymn was then sung, and the benediction was pronounced. The people then shook each other by the hand; and, lastly, they defiled before me, and I shook hands with the entire body. I returned home thanking God and taking courage.

REMARKABLE RESULTS OF THE OBSERVANCE OF THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

I had previously made known to some of the native pastors that the first week in January would be set apart for prayer, for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon pastors, officebearers, churches, the governments, and the world at large, by great numbers of churches throughout the world. They at once fell in with the plan, and the week was solemnly kept in eight districts. I drew out a programme for the guidance of the minister of this district, a copy of which he sent to the other ministers. I attended the meetings held here, and was truly delighted with the manner in which they were conducted. Two addresses were delivered and two prayers were offered up each day, intermixed with suitable hymns, and the accounts I received from the other districts were equally gratifying. Now for the fruit. Two young men, brothers, from the district where I had spent the Sabbath and the introduction of the new year have offered themselves for the institution, and seven from the districts where the meetings had been held, and one from a more remote district. Ten young men, mostly with their wives and children, have already arrived there. Others have applied, but there is no room for them during this term. The tutor, the Rev. I. L. Green, writes me to say that he is much pleased with their deportment. That they will obtain situations as pastors in Tahiti when their term of study is completed may be doubtful, but they will return with an amount of information which will make them useful members of the churches, and officebearers in them, which, by the Divine blessing, may be of incalculable service to the cause of truth and piety.

Miscellaneous.

DUBLIN UNIVERSITY PRAYER UNION—INVITATION TO IRISH MISSIONARIES IN FOREIGN LANDS.

To the Editors of Evangelical Christendom.

Religious Societies' Rooms, 22, Trinity College, Dublin.

September, 1862.

DEAR SIRS,—I trust you will permit me, through your columns, to invite all missionaries of every evangelical denomination, who may have gone forth from Ireland, to unite themselves with the Dublin University Prayer Union, if graduates of the University, as members; or, if not University men, as associate members.

Our Prayer Union was formed in the close of 1854, and was at that time composed of some half-dozen students of the University, who met together for prayer on behalf of missionary work, and for the purpose of communicating information to one another on the progress of the Church of Christ. Since then our number has rapidly increased, and amounts now nearly to two hundred. It must be borne in mind that there has been no canvass for members, and all those on our list, with very few exceptions (consisting chiefly of missionaries abroad), have joined us when students in the University, and have been attendants at our early morning meetings for prayer and for consultation on missionary subjects.

Our Union contemplates two objects—the increase of a missionary spirit among the members of the University, and the strengthening of the brethren engaged in missionary labour abroad. The former object we endeavour to attain by our meetings on the first and third Saturdays in each month, in which the attention of our members is directed to the work abroad, as possessing equal, if not vastly superior, claims on the serious consideration of all candidates for the ministry. By endeavouring to promote a spirit of prayer on this subject the Committee earnestly trust that an increasing number may be led to devote themselves to the foreign field.

Our dear brethren abroad can aid us, and do aid us, in this endeavour, for as their letters to our Union are read at our meetings, and extracts from them are printed in our report, we trust they may be thus instrumental in stirring up more to go forth and preach among the heathen the unsearchable riches of Christ.

Some few have been stirred up by the instrumentality of our Union to devote themselves to the missionary work. The Committee regret that these have been so few, and therefore the more earnestly would exhort their members to pray the Lord of the harvest that He would send forth labourers into His harvest. Even, however, in the case of those that have not gone forth much good has been done by the prayerful consideration of the subject.

The work of our dear brethren abroad we endeavour to assist by prayer, making mention of them often individually in our prayers. In order to keep up a lively remembrance of our Union, and of their connexion with it, we not only invite them to join with us, though absent in the body, yet present in spirit, at the Throne of Grace, but we endeavour also to correspond with all such at least once a year, and send them our annual report, and most cordially do we welcome any letters from them in return.

Thus, though in different lands, we attempt to realise that we are all one in Christ, and endeavour to help one another in our earthly pilgrimage and labour for Christ, by special remembrance before the Throne.

Our members are requested each Saturday morning to engage in prayer with reference to the special subjects mentioned in our rules. Especially would we remind them that on the first and third Saturdays of each month (with the exception of July, August, and September), at eight o'clock in the morning the Union holds its meetings within the walls of the University, in rooms which have been liberally granted by the Board of Trinity College for the use of the religious societies of the University which have been sanctioned by them.

These meetings, being open to all students of the University whether members of our Union or not, have been useful in bringing together men likeminded in their desire to follow Christ, and in preserving many from the necessary snares of University life.

We rejoice to say that there are kindred Unions in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge for private prayer, with which our Union keeps up a friendly connexion.

The Committee of the Dublin University Prayer Union have, after due consideration, thought it desirable to invite those non-University men who are actually engaged in missionary work to join their ranks as associate members. We naturally invite only our fellow-countrymen, and leave it to the Oxford and Cambridge Unions, if their committees should deem it advisable, to invite our dear English brethren.

Such persons as desire to unite with us will kindly write to me on the subject some time before the close of the year, in order that their names may appear in our next Report, which will be issued in January. All graduates of this University are free to join with us. The subscription to our Union is small, being two shillings annually, or ten shillings and sixpence life subscription, but our missionary brethren are not expected to pay even that.

I remain, in behalf of the Committee,

Yours very truly,

CHARLES H. H. WRIGHT, Clk., M.A.,
Trinity College, Dublin, and Exeter College, Oxford;

Secretary for Foreign Correspondence, Dublin University Prayer Union.

P.S. I shall feel much obliged to any foreign missionary journals that may insert this communication, which they are requested to consider as addressed equally to them.

Literature.

Ancient Empires; their Origin, Succession, and Results, with a Preliminary View of the Unity and First Migrations of Mankind. The Religious Tract Society.

THIS is an useful popular condensation of ancient history, and of its bearing upon and connexion with the progress of true religion. The kingdom of Egypt, the Assyrian Monarchy, the Persian, the Macedonian, and Roman Empires, are successively and separately treated of in abridged histories. But (besides some introductory observations) four preliminary chapters are devoted to subjects of high importance, and of special interest at the present time. First: "The Unique Claims and Characteristics of the Scripture Ancient History." Second: "The Original Unity and Chief Early Distributions of the Human Race," Third: "First Germs of Kingdoms in the Ancient World." Fourth: "Origin and Early Destination of the Hebrew Race." There is a concluding chapter on the "Revolution Effected by Christianity." The whole volume, therefore, is designed rather as an "historical review," than as an abridgement of history. The historical treatment is mixed with a good deal of discussion on deeply-important topics in literature and philosophy; and the result is a very valuable essay upon the themes of Providence, Prophecy, and Progress, with collateral disquisitions, well calculated to elucidate and confirm the truth, as well as to deepen the conviction of there being a settled purpose of the Great Disposer, which, if it be mysterious, finds its solution in Christianity only. On whatever points of detail or of hypothesis we may sometimes differ from the writer, the book, as a whole, cannot fail to inform the ordinary reader, to clarify many obscure topics, and to impress valuable principles, while gratifying the thirst for knowledge and that peculiar delight which arises from connecting causes and effects.

Pentecostal Blessings, What were They? and may We still Pray for Them? By the Rev. DAVID PITCAIRN, &c. Wertheim, Macintosh, and Hunt. 1862.

A LITTLE volume of notes of lectures, with introductory observations, from a well-known sound and spiritual author. Distinguishing between the miraculous gifts, and the effectual graces of the Spirit, Mr. Pitcairn opposes the novel notions of certain modern sects, that it is a mistake to pray for the "coming down" or "pouring out" of the Holy Ghost now, since that was done once for all at Pentecost; and on scriptural grounds he asserts and vindicates the practice. Crotchety exaggerations of partially-true notions are the plague of the Church in our times. We think Mr. Pitcairn's lectures evidence the spirit of a sounder mind.

The Believer's Treasury. By D. DEWAR, D.D., LL.D., late Principal of Marischal College and University, Aberdeen. Glasgow: T. Murray and Sons.

THIS is an agreeable volume of doctrinal and experimental divinity; thoroughly sound, pleasant, and profitable reading; and a rich "treasury" of scriptural truths for the edification and comfort of believers.

The Complete Works of Richard Sibbes, D.D., &c. Edited, with Memoir, by the Rev. ALEXANDER BULLOCK GROSART, &c., Kinross. Edinburgh: James Nichol.

IN continuation of the series of standard divines of the Puritan period, we have here the second volume of the works of Sibbes, of which we noticed the first in a former number. The first volume contained the whole of the works of Sibbes which he had published himself; the present contains his larger treatises from the Old Testament, and some sermons; and is to be followed by the publication of his commentaries on the New Testament. We may express a doubt whether fidelity to the original does absolutely compel to the preservation of titles and phrases which are not only quaint and opposed to modern sentiments, but are in English language repugnant to good taste and idiomatic usage. The "Expository Sermons on Canticles," for instance, might, we suppose, have been honestly published under such a title, and its original name mentioned in a note. But "Bowels Opened" is a title likely to excite the scoffs of some and unpleasant impressions in others, notwithstanding the vindication of the prefatory note. That treatise appears to have been dedicated to Edward, Viscount Mandeville (an ancestor of the Duke of Manchester). This volume is rich in evangelical divinity in the style of the day.

Farewell Sunday and St. Bartholomew's Day. Two Sermons, preached at the King's Weigh-House Chapel, on Sunday, the 17th, and Sunday, the 24th of August, 1862. By T. BINNEY. Jackson, Walford, and Hodder.

THE Rev. Samuel Slater was for nearly forty years, previous to the passing of the Act of Uniformity, the incumbent of the Collegiate Chapel of St. Katherine, in the Tower. He had been educated at Cambridge, and, there is reason to believe, had been episcopally ordained. By the Act of 1662 he was ejected from his living. He then gathered around him some of the members of his old flock, met them in private, formed them into a society, and so laid the foundation of the religious community which now worships in the Weigh-House Chapel, and of which Mr. Binney is the pastor. To these facts the first of the two discourses before us has special reference, as well as to the conduct of the ejected ministers generally. The second discourse is designed as an impartial inquiry into the real significance of the great event of 1662—what it was, what it indicated, what preceded, and what followed it. Upon a question which has elicited such opposite opinions, not only on the part of Churchmen and Dissenters, but among members of the same communion, it is only to be expected that we should find abundant material for controversy, though many persons of a different way of thinking from the preacher may perhaps be surprised by what they may deem his large concessions. But the whole subject is dealt with in a liberal and loving spirit, and with characteristic ability.

The Psalms: a Devotional Handbook, with Scripture Illustrations. The Proverbs, ditto. The Epistle to the Romans, ditto. Hebrews, ditto. S. Bagster and Sons.

THESE are neat and handy and well-bound specimens of portions of Scripture in a pocket portable form. Instead of Scripture references, we have the entire of a verse or verses of other Scriptures in italic text, quoted fully in accompaniment with the passage illustrated. The idea seems good; but, of course, all will depend on the judgment displayed in the appropriateness of the selected portions. In this respect it strikes us that there is great inequality; and to illustrate copiously Psalms by Psalms, or Hebrews by Hebrews, is scanty satisfactory.

Altar Zeal; or, Paul in the Pulpit. By the Rev. JOHN MACFARLANE, LL.D. J. Nisbet and Co.

A CLEAR and emphatic assertion of Gospel truth, and the power of its preaching (on the text 1 Cor. ix. 16). We cannot say of it that "Materiam superabat opus." The matter is intrinsic, the workmanship a trifle too ambitious sometimes.

Hymns for Pastors and People. By SAMUEL DUNN. Hamilton, Adams, and Co.

WE cannot quite agree with all the dogmatic assertions in the preface put forward by Mr. Edmund Dunn, the editor of this volume, and brother of the composer. To make a good writer of sacred poetry, there is, in our opinion, no loss, but a great gain, by the addition of true poetic genius to the theological and devotional qualifications needed for such a task. "Correct and vigorous versification" may indeed produce theology and devotional exercises in verse. But Toplady, Charles Wesley, Cowper, Bishop Ken, and other true poets, have done more; and, with a very few exceptions, these exercises of Mr. Dunn seem to us rather heavy and tame; while these very exceptions establish, we think, that "figures derived from the visible creation," and something of poetic sentiment and fire and polish, are more to the purpose than mere paraphrases in verse. We would instance Nos. 88, 89, 180, 148, 318, as of the more favourable specimens of this kind.

The Papal Criminal History, preceded by De Romanarum Religionis Origine. Biography of Augustus Cæsar. The Origin of Christianity. Also New Historical Facts connected with the Apostles John, Peter, Paul, and Jacobus. (First Bishop of Jerusalem, and Brother of our Lord Jesus Christ). Of Four Hebrew Pontifices omitted in Genesis. The Real Donations by the Emperor Constantine to Bishop Sylvester. (The whole taken from a Copy of the unpublished MS. Codex in the Vatican.) Trial of Pope Gregory IV. By the Imperial Judge and Juris. The History of the Popess Joanna; the Theodora's and Marozia's Reign; the Great Countess Matilda and her Papal Paramour. The Orgies of the Holy Roman Catholic See; together with Venice, its Present Martyrdom and its Former Glories, &c. By Dr. Bæcer, Commissary Director of Police, &c. London: W. Easby, and all Booksellers. Printed for the Author.

WE have given in full the title of this curious and mad-looking book, to peruse the whole of which, with a view to correct criticism, is impracticable, and to describe which, without such a perusal, is equally so. It is a strange farrago of Latin, Italian, English, and slang, and is intended for a heavy blow to the temporal power of the Pope and the Papacy in general. Being the work of a foreigner, it cannot perhaps be measured by the same rules exactly as if it were an English work; but there are many things in it which would have been better left in the veiled obscurity of a learned language, with much that has been so.

1. Family Prayers for a Month. 2. Short Family Prayers. By H. CHAMPNEY. Wertheim, Mackintosh, and Hunt.

Two small manuals, which the compiler appears to have taken some pains to render useful to a numerous class of persons. The first, in addition to daily prayers for a month, contains prayers for special occasions; in the second, particular books in the Bible are made the basis of a series of devotional exercises.

PORTUGUESE TRACTS AND RELIGIOUS BOOKS.

WE have received a bundle of small books and tracts (from Brazil) in the Portuguese language, which it seems desirable to mention, as there is now apparent an awakening in the peninsula; and many who are interested in the cause in Portugal may be, perhaps, not aware of the existence of so many available helps in this language. Amongst others, we have, translated from the English, David Bogue's "Divine Authority of the New Testament," "The Pilgrim's Progress," John Angell James's "Anxious Inquirer," the "Life of Thomas Ward" (Nisbet and Co.), the "Serpent of Brass," &c. As some of the books are printed at New York, some at Rio Janeiro, others in London, Oporto, and other places, we are not able to notice them so usefully for the purpose of their circulation as the sender desires. But we presume there may be some dépôt in London where they are to be found. The tracts appear to be published by our Religious Tract Society and the American Tract Society. The books are all of a sound evangelical character; and there are hymns, textbooks, and children's school-books; so that for Portuguese sailors, for children, or for possible distribution in Portugal itself, there is an abundant supply of evangelical instruction.

Monthly Retrospect.

HOME.

THE Royal Family of England still remain on the Continent. It will be matter of thankful gratification to all loyal subjects that Her Majesty has greatly improved in health by her sojourn, and has nearly, if not altogether, recovered from that depression of spirits under which she has laboured ever since her husband's death. Of equal interest to the people is the now officially-announced engagement of the Prince of Wales to the Princess Alexandra, of the Royal stock of Denmark, and the intimation that the wedding of the Royal pair will take place early in the ensuing spring. We need do no more than allude here to the reports which have reached this country of the mental as well as the personal accomplishments of the youthful bride; and we are sure all Englishmen will hail with delight the marriage of the heir to the throne as the best pledge he could give of his freedom from the follies and profligacies that form such terrible temptations to young men in high places, and of his deliberate preference for the pure and calm enjoyments of domestic life. We desire to see in it, also, an assurance that the Prince will fill up, as far as he may, that place in his mother's counsels which his father's death has left vacant, and that he may break the spell which has hitherto hung over all the sovereigns of the House of Brunswick, who have in all preceding reigns had the misfortune of finding the leader of Opposition to their Ministers in the heir to the throne.

As we were going to press last month the intelligence was announced of the death of the Archbishop of Canterbury. He died peacefully at the Archiepiscopal Palace of Addington, in his eighty-second year, having filled the Primacy for fourteen years. Dr. John Bird Sumner, one of the mildest and gentlest of prelates that ever sat in the marble chair of Canterbury, was the son of a clergyman, and very early in life attached himself to the evangelical party in the Church of England, which at that time enjoyed neither the popularity nor the influence it does now. In early youth he distinguished himself by various publications, which showed much grasp as well as originality of mind; and in 1828, when George IV. was King, and the Duke of Wellington Prime Minister, he was promoted to the see of Chester; his brother, who is ten years his junior, having been two years before promoted to the see of Winchester, which he still holds. At the time of Dr. Sumner's appointment, and for many years afterwards, the diocese of Chester embraced the whole busy and populous district of Cheshire and Lancashire; in the midst of which the Church of England had stood still, till its influence was nearly choked by the strong and vigorous growth of Dissent around it. Dr. Sumner set himself to revive the life and extend the usefulness of the Church; and he met with extraordinary success. District churches rose up on all sides; under his gentle, but efficient stimulus, the means were provided in abundance, and the Church rose to a position in the manufacturing districts which it has not again lost. The new see of Manchester was afterwards carved out of the diocese; and in 1848, on the death of Dr. Howley, the Primacy was offered to Dr. Sumner by Lord

John Russell. The period of his occupation of the see has been distinguished by several important religious controversies, and in all of them, while the Archbishop held his own clear convictions, yet his characteristic mildness prevented him from expressing them with asperity, or overbearing his opponents with the weight of his official authority. "The meekness of wisdom" was strikingly illustrated in his character; and we believe it would be difficult to point to a question on which he expressed an opinion which the judgments of his contemporaries has reversed. He was a wise, and good, and holy man; and his successor would require to walk warily if he would enjoy a tithe of his predecessor's influence for good. Who that successor may be has been the subject of much speculation. It was at first generally believed that the offer would be made to the Bishop of London; more recently the Archbishop of York has been confidently named. Indeed, we had scarcely written the above, when it became known that the latter prelate (Dr. Charles Thomas Longley) had been offered and had accepted the appointment. His Grace was born in 1794, was consecrated Bishop of Ripon in 1836, translated to the see of Durham in 1856, and to that of York in 1860. He has never been identified with any of the parties in the Church, but he has the reputation of orthodoxy; and the fact that he has been called to preside over three dioceses in succession, before his elevation to the head of the episcopate, shows that he is regarded as an able administrator.

The vacancies in the Irish Church caused by the death of the venerable Archbishop of Armagh have been filled up during the present month, to the entire satisfaction of the best and worthiest among Irish Churchmen. The Bishop of Kilmore, a distant relative of his Grace, a scholar, a gentleman, and a Christian, has been appointed to the Primacy. It is the more to the credit of the Government that they made this appointment, as great influence was used to induce Lord Palmerston to appoint an Englishman to the office. Plausible arguments were urged in favour of such a step, and several names were mentioned, any one of whom, it was said, would go far to redeem the Church of Ireland from that taint of Puritanism which gives it so unlovely an aspect in certain eyes. The Premier resisted these influences, and gave the diocese to one who was not even a political adherent: a sure sign that the fittest man was sought for. The same principle was acted upon in the case of Dr. Beresford's successor to the see of Kilmore. Dean Verschoyle, who was named, as well as Dr. Gregg, for the see of Cork, has followed his former rival—if rival be the proper word—to the Episcopal Bench. The Dean was an opponent of the national system of education, and acted as honorary secretary to the Scriptural Education Schools. He enjoyed the unbounded confidence of the Irish Protestants till a few years ago, when, concurring with the late venerable Primate, he recommended those clergymen who could not support schools in their parishes to accept the Government aid, on Government terms. A storm of abuse was thus brought down on him from those who insisted on maintaining the opposition to the last, and he resigned his office as secretary. But it is pleasant to add, that this momentary ebullition passed away, and the Dean was again trusted, honoured, and revered by the Church, before he became a bishop. With so many reasons to be satisfied with the conduct of Ministers, it is to be regretted that the Protestants of the North should have chosen the present moment for a hostile demonstration at Belfast. The highminded Ulster men were irritated that the Government should have allowed the Roman Catholics to march in procession through the streets of Dublin, while they are not allowed a flag or a drum on the anniversary of the Boyne; and 20,000 men met to protest against the partiality. The more prominent members of the party, it is fair to say—with the exception of the venerable Dr. Cooke—held aloof from the ill-timed gathering, the only immediate result of which has been great irritation of feeling between the lower classes of both religions, nightly riots and breaches of the peace in the town, and a great influx of police and military force to preserve order.

The Episcopalians in Scotland have manifested an increased flutter throughout their little community during the present month. Our readers are aware that the old Scottish service for the Holy Communion differs from the form observed in the English Church, having a decided leaning to the Romish doctrine of transubstantiation. On this ground, it was offensive to the members of the Church of England, settled in Scotland; and for some time past the two were used according to the preferences of the congregation, the Scottish form being considered of primary authority. In July last an Episcopal Synod agreed, by a narrow majority, to depose the Scottish form from its place of honour, to tolerate it only in those congregations that had long been accustomed to its use, and to prohibit its adoption in any new congregation that might be formed. This decision was sent down to the different dioceses, and is to be finally settled at an adjourned synod which is about to meet as we go to press. Neither parties are satisfied. The adherents of the Scottish form writhe under their defeat, while the supporters of the English office threaten, unless the Scottish form is prohibited altogether, to secede from the communion and form relations with the Church of England.

The International Exhibition, which has drawn so many visitors to London during the present season, has caused also an unusual amount of activity among our religious and benevolent societies. Among others, the Sunday School Union resolved to take advantage of the presence of so many friends of religious education in the metropolis, and held a Conference of their friends, at which various questions relating to the organization and management of Sunday-schools were discussed. There was but one opinion in the Conference, that the end of Sunday-school instruction ought to be religious impression, not secular attainments, and that the teachers should be personally impressed with the solemnities of their work. The Conference sat for three days, and the whole proceedings were of an interesting character, and evinced great cordiality and unity of feeling among Sunday-school teachers.

FOREIGN.

France is the centre of Europe; but the interest of France is at the present moment centred in Rome. Shall the French garrison leave Rome? That is only another form of the question—Shall the Pope be deprived of his temporal power? The French Government have just given to the world a document which professes to contain their views on this grave question, which to English understandings, at least, leaves the matter as impenetrably mysterious as ever. In June last, the French Ambassador, acting on instructions from the Emperor, offered to guarantee the Pope in his present possession of Rome, if he would give up his claim to the possessions of which he has been deprived. Something also is said about Rome lowering her barriers to the rest of Italy, and allowing the municipalities to govern themselves; the meaning of which is not very clear, especially when taken in connexion with the next proposition—that if these terms are agreed to, the Papal debt will be thrown upon the Italian kingdom. It is needless, however, to attempt to penetrate the Imperial meaning, as the Pope positively rejected these propositions, and refused even to discuss them. The Emperor threatens that he cannot stay in Rome for ever, in the face of so much obstinacy: but in the meantime nothing is done; and the friends of Italy are profoundly discouraged by his timidity and vacillation. In our correspondent's letter the opposing interests which alternately sway the councils and suspend the judgment of the French Emperor are very graphically set forth, and our readers will be able to see in it another illustration—in addition to that which the history of mankind has often before presented—of the nominal masters of the world being themselves subjected to weak and unworthy influences. In the midst of these distractions and hesitations, it is pleasant to find that the cause of Protestantism increases. The fact is so palpable, that it has forced itself upon the notice of the Municipal Council of Paris—not the most quick-sighted body, we may be sure, to discover the growth of reformed opinions; and they have resolved to erect a new Protestant church in the city, as a part of their national duty. We may be permitted to rejoice in this fact, apart from our interest in Protestantism, and solely regarding it as one more spiritual instrument likely to be of use in staying the moral pestilence that is now desolating the hearts and homes of Frenchmen. Our correspondent gives us some returns on this subject, computed from official statistics, which present a hideous picture of French society. We have no wish to glorify our own country at the expense of our neighbours—in fact, we believe late events show that crime is also on the increase amongst ourselves; but not to the extent that it appears to be among the half-superstitious, half-sceptical, and wholly-demoralised classes in Paris.

The heart of Italy, and indeed we may say of Europe, has been profoundly moved by the issue of the expedition of Garibaldi. There are few men who approved of his adventure when he undertook it; few who anticipated for it any happier ending than what has occurred; and yet there are few who do not mourn over the misfortunes—defeated, wounded, and a prisoner—of the most unselfish hero of modern times. His painful wound is gradually, but slowly, healing. Till he has recovered, nothing can be decided about his future disposal; but in spite of all rumours to the contrary, the opinion gains ground that there will be no trial—that the King will throw the veil of a general amnesty over all that has passed. And in the meantime the schism in the Church between the adherents and the opponents of the temporal power extends every day, and a bishop who preferred his country to the Pope was recently denied the rites of his own Church on his deathbed. It may seem that disputes on secular matters will do little either way for the interests of spiritual religion; but it should be recollected that from the agitation of questions no less secular in our own country, at the time of the Reformation, has been slowly evolved the measure of that pure Gospel light w now enjoy. For the way in which that light is breaking here and there upon Italy, we refer to the deeply-interesting letter of our Italian correspondent.

The great movements of which France and Italy are the theatre ought not to blind us to the importance of those internal religious revolutions which, from time to time, force their way to the surface throughout Germany. Our readers may have seen in the secular press some notice of the disturbance that has taken place in Hanover, in consequence of an attempt by the King to impose a new catechism, for the instruction of youth, on all the parishes; the letter of our correspondent, this month, will enable them to understand the rationale of the matter. It appears that the catechism favoured by the King would be preferred by all evangelical men to the one in present use; and the reviving religious life of that country induced his Majesty, whose personal piety is well known, to believe that the time had come when the change would be hailed by the great body of the people. And so it probably would have been, had the change been left to the people themselves, acting through those ecclesiastical organizations with which we are so familiar. But in Germany there is no proper ecclesiastical organization; the King issues decrees to the Church just as he does to the army; and George V. forgot to take into account that spiritual revivals are invariably accompanied by a strong sense of individual responsibility to God, with which secular authority is incompatible. Hence his order disgusted many of those who, on other grounds, were in favour of the book. His Majesty has now gone the right way to work, leaving each parish to adopt the catechism it prefers. When truth and error thus meet on fair terms, we can have no doubt of the issue. For the rest, it is matter of gratification that the Gustavus-Adolphus Society—an association for home evangelization, which, with some faults, has done much good—has met this year in Bavaria, and that its operations are allowed free scope in Austria itself. The Catholic societies are active too, having had a meeting in Aix-la-Chapelle, where the superstitions of the people have been stirred by the exhibition of such mummeries as the shirt of St. Joseph and the swaddling clothes of the manger. But amidst these fooleries, and worse, our correspondent recognises the good these societies attempt, according to their light, to accomplish. From Prussia we learn that the political agitation which has for some time been going on there is likely to be appeased by the retirement of the more obnoxious members of the Cabinet. As it is our correspondent's deliberate opinion that in Germany true religion goes hand in hand with political freedom, we trust these changes in the State will give fresh vigour and tone to life in the Church.

We earnestly direct the attention of our readers to an appeal which will be found in another page, on behalf of an orphanage institution at Beyrout. The indefatigable Pastor Fliedner, who established an institution of Protestant deaconesses at Kaiserwerth, in Germany, more than a quarter of a century ago, and has since diffused their action over all the four quarters of the world, was not likely to overlook the misery caused by the late frightful massacres in the Lebanon. A body of Christian women—Sisters from Kaiserwerth—went forth to collect the widows and orphan children rendered destitute by that catastrophe into hospitals, to feed, cloth, tend them, ministering to body and soul alike; and not only saving them from starvation now, but fitting them to act as the leaven of civilisation and Christianity among their countrymen in future years. Help is needed from England. Many, we are sure, will give that help for its own sake—they will give it with tenfold alacrity when they know that the appeal is made by Florence Nightingale. We shall be happy to be the channel of our readers' bounty to this excellent institution.

The newspapers have for some time past contained fragmentary notices respecting the death of Sir Allan M'Nab, a gentleman of great influence in Canada, and to whom it was mainly owing that the insurrection in 1837 was put down, and the province preserved to British connexion. A controversy had arisen whether he died a Protestant or a Roman Catholic; but the grounds were difficult to be understood. We are indebted to a Canadian correspondent for a clear and connected account of the matter. There is no dispute that he lived a Protestant; but the Romish bishop of the district avers that, about a year before his death, he incidentally mentioned to him his wish to die in the bosom of the Romish Church. Taking that for what it is worth, it appears the prelate made no further attempt to convert him till he was in the agonies of death, and then arose an unseemly contest over the unhappy man's dying bed, not to induce him to make an intelligent confession of his faith, but to get him to submit to some ritual mummary which would infallibly save his soul. We may well echo the words of our correspondent, "What an episcopate! what a priesthood! what a faith!"

The intelligence from America continues to be of the same afflictive character as ever. There are no symptoms of peace—on the contrary, the war is wider, the battles are bloodier, and the hostile passions are more embittered with every successive mail. The fortune of arms has recently turned in favour of the South; the Virginian soil has been cleared of the armies of the North; and the Southern troops have advanced into Maryland, which, though a Slave State, has up to this time been retained within the Union. In New York and in the New England States a feeling is growing that their cause can never prosper till they adopt as their motto the cause of negro emancipation; but the President and his Ministers are reluctant to adopt that view. As matters stand at present, it seems more likely that slavery will be spread over the North than exterminated in the South. In the face of a civil war so extensive, bloody, and desolating, religious movements languish; and we fear the arrest thus laid on Christian effort will continue to paralyse its progress for a long time to come.

A correspondent from China sends us an interesting document from the Governor of the province of Fu-Chau, explaining and enforcing the new policy of the Imperial Government with regard to the Christian religion. According to this authority, no man who becomes a convert to the doctrines of the Lord of Heaven is to be molested on that account, or compelled to contribute to the expenses of idolatrous processions; but if any difference is to be made between the Christian convert and the old religionist, it is to be in favour of the former. It is true that this proclamation is issued directly in favour of the Roman Catholics; and we have here an illustration of the pains taken by the French secular authorities, in all possible ways, to advance the interests of the ecclesiastical power; but of course the same advantages will be given to the Protestants. British Christians may, therefore, thankfully recognise the fact that their many prayers have been answered, and that a wide door and effectual is now opened through the whole extent of the empire of China. It remains to be seen whether we have courage and faith enough to rise up and possess the land.

We print elsewhere an interesting narrative of the proceedings of Mr. Ellis at Madagascar. His reception by the King and the principal men was most cordial, and he has been privileged to conduct Divine service in the presence of his Majesty and the Court on Sunday afternoon, which he trusts will become a regular service. The Roman Catholics, however, are also active, and we may be sure they will leave no effort untried to insinuate themselves into his Majesty's good graces. Mr. Ellis needs the prayers of the Church, that he may exemplify the simplicity that is in Christ in a position so full of snares to those who would cherish singleness of purpose. The people, it will be seen, are eager for Christian instruction, and were disappointed when they found that Mr. Ellis arrived without Bibles—an oversight that we believe has ere this been corrected.

We regret to learn the death of the wife of Dr. Livingstone. She left this country in the middle of last year, and had only joined her husband in Africa about three months, when she expired, from fever, at Shupana. She leaves five children—the eldest about sixteen, and the youngest from three to four years of age—who are at present in Scotland. Mrs. Livingstone was the daughter of that veteran missionary, the Rev. Robert Moffat. The doctor acutely feels his loss. At the date of the last advices, Dr. Livingstone was about to proceed to Mozambique and Johanna. By the mail which brings this last news, we have also the painful intelligence of the death of one son of the Rev. Robert Moffat, and the dangerous illness of another. Mr. Robert Moffat, jun., died suddenly near Durraman, in Mosilikatse's country; and Mr. John Smith Moffat, his brother, has been compelled, from the cause we have stated, to leave that country, with his wife. Our readers may remember that in the August number of Evangelical Christendom there appeared an interesting letter from Mr. John Smith Moffat's pen, narrating the history of the mission which he is now providentially compelled to quit. May the sympathy and prayers of the friends of missions follow him in his enforced retirement! and especially may both be called forth on behalf of that venerated and devoted servant of Christ, his father, who has been thus thrice smitten in the persons of his children!

A letter from a correspondent at Tahiti supplies us with an interesting account of the religious condition of that island. The moderate tone of the writer with respect to the French Government is a complete guarantee for his impartiality; and we thus see the difficulties with which the Protestant congregations have to contend. The Imperial Government does not appear disposed to deal unfairly with the Protestants; but the underlings do their best to instil the idea that Protestantism is another word for English leanings; that the Romanists alone are loyal subjects to France. Notwithstanding, it is cheering to find that the number of communicants in the Protestant churches is as great as ever; and that the week of prayer, which was observed with as much fervour in that distant island of the sea as in any part of England, has been followed by a remarkable revival, and a willingness among the young to come forward and dedicate themselves to the Lord. The prayers of all Christians are much needed for that sorely-tried people.

WEEK OF PRAYER.—1863.

The following Invitation to observe a Week of Special Prayer at the commencement of the ensuing year has been issued by the Committee of Council. They thankfully acknowledge the valuable aid rendered by the various Missionary Societies, the British and Foreign Bible Society, the Religious Tract Society, and other institutions and individuals, in kindly undertaking to transmit copies of the address to their respective stations and agents abroad.

A supply of the address has also been sent by the Committee to the chief places on the Continent, and means have been adopted for translations being made and extensively circulated in the various languages. Already translations have appeared in many of the Foreign religious journals.

PROPOSED WEEK OF SPECIAL PRAYER.

January 4—11, 1863.

Former invitations to observe a Week of Special and United Prayer at the beginning of the year have met with a very extensive and hearty response. From almost every country in every quarter of the globe did much prayer ascend to heaven during that hallowed week on behalf both of the Church and of the World.

The manifest blessings by which these seasons have been marked render it imperative upon us to repeat them. Christians of every country and name are, therefore, affectionately recommended to set apart the eight days, January 4—11 (inclusive) of the ensuing year, for simultaneous and earnest supplication with thanksgiving to Him who has commanded—"Pray without ceasing. In everything give thanks: for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you."

The following topics are suggested as suitable for a prominent place in our exhortations and intercessions on the successive days, the general adoption of which would give a character of agreement to our services highly acceptable to the Lord (for so He has taught us), and animating in the consciousness of it to our own hearts.

SUNDAY, JAN. 4.—Sermons on the Dispensation of the Spirit.

MONDAY, JAN. 5.—Humble Confession of our manifold Sins: As Individuals, Families, Churches, and Nations. Prayer for the Lord's blessing on the Services of the week.

TUESDAY, JAN. 6.—The Conversion of the Ungodly: especially those of our own Families and Congregations—Larger success to all the means employed for the Evangelisation of different Classes of the Population, and for checking every form of vice and immorality.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 7.—Increased Spirituality and Holiness in the Children of God: leading to their closer union and sympathy with each other, and their more marked separation from the world—a richer baptism of the Holy Spirit on all Ministers and their fellow-labourers in Christian lands, to quicken their love and zeal, and make them "wise to win souls"—a blessing upon all Seminaries of sound learning and religious education—a large increase of devotedness, self-denial and liberality on the part of the people at large.

THURSDAY, JAN. 8.—The Conversion of the Jews—the more extensive and successful Preaching of the Gospel among the Heathen—the revival of pure Christianity among the Ancient Churches of the East—the overthrow of every form of anti-Christian error—the comforting and liberation of them who are in bonds for the Gospel's sake—the prevalence of Peace among all Nations—a blessing upon the souls of all Brethren and Sisters engaged in Missionary labour among Heathen and other unevangelised populations.

FRIDAY, JAN. 9.—The Word of God: The universal recognition of its Divine inspiration and authority—the power of the Holy Spirit to accompany its circulation and perusal. The Lord's Day: The acknowledgment of its sanctity and obligation—a blessing upon all efforts for promoting its better observance at Home and on the Continent.

SATURDAY, JAN. 10.—Thanksgiving for our numerous Temporal Blessings and Spiritual Privileges—Prayer for Kings and all in authority—for all who are suffering from war, or scarcity, or any other affliction—for all sorts and Conditions of Men.

SUNDAY, JAN. 11.—Sermons: The Church "praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance."

May the Spirit of grace and of supplication be abundantly poured out upon all who respond to this invitation! May their prayers come up with acceptance before God, the Father Almighty, through the Priesthood of His Blessed Son! The Lord "will be very gracious unto thee at the voice of thy cry: when He shall hear it, He will answer thee."

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN THE TURKISH EMPIRE.

At a meeting of the Committee held on the 19th of June last a letter was read from the Rev. E. Bliss, Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance Committee at Constantinople, asking, on behalf of that committee, the attention of the Committee of Council to the present condition of the Nestorian Christians. These poor people, he says, have long been under a heavy yoke, but of late it has become more grievous than ever. The Khans, who hold to them something like the relation of feudal lords, grind them to the very dust, and plunder them of almost everything, without regard to any principle of justice or mercy. The letter continues:—"In one large village the people lately told one of these Khans that if he would give them their bread and clothing, he might take all the rest. But he, knowing that his rapacious plunderings, made without license, brought him a richer revenue, would not consent to the proposal. Not only are the Nestorians subject to these arbitrary exactions, but their very lives are in the hands of these petty rulers, who are entirely irresponsible, and against whose wrongs there is no redress. Nearly thirty of their wives and daughters have been snatched away by Mussulmans, and no redress has been obtained. Is it strange that these oppressions are making the people mad? They have waited long, hoping that their own Government would do something for their relief; but they see no light in the horizon, and they are becoming desperate. It is said that there has been an earnest discussion among them during the past winter of what they were to do. At one time there was a talk of a general exodus of the whole people into Russia, as the nearest and most promising asylum. Late accounts indicate that this state of things has been made known in Russia, and that the emissaries of the Greek Church are moving to take advantage of it. . . . They have made propositions of a formal character to the Nestorians to enter the Greek Church, promising salaries to ecclesiastics, and new churches, bells, images, and church ornaments, and the payment of all their taxes for two years to the common people who will accept the terms." Mr. Bliss then inquires, on behalf of his committee, whether the Committee of Council can bring the matter of these oppressions under the notice of the British Government, and secure its friendly offices with the Persian Government in behalf of this poor people. "It would be," he says, "an act of humanity to them, and it would be doing a kindness to the Persian Government. I need not say how undesirable it is for the interests of Persia, for British interests there, and for the interests of the missionary work in Central Asia, that the power of Russia should not be increased."

Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, who kindly consented to bring this letter before Her Majesty's Government, has transmitted to the Committee the following communication which he had received upon the subject:—

Foreign-office, July 12th, 1862.

My Lord,—I am directed by Earl Russell to return to your Lordship the accompanying letter which you left in his hands, and I am to inform you that his Lordship has sent a copy of it to Her Majesty's Minister in Persia, with instructions to use his unofficial efforts to obtain relief for the Nestorians from the oppression under which they are stated to be suffering.—I am, my Lord, your Lordship's most obedient, humble servant,

A. H. LAYARD.

The Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, G.C.B.

At the meeting of the Committee at which the above official communication was, in due course, read there were present, as visitors, the two Nestorian Christians, Presbyter Yohanan and his companion, of Oroomiah, an interesting account of whom is given in last month's number of Evangelical Christendom. As one of the chief objects of their visit to this country was to endeavour to obtain, through English influence, some relief for their people from their grievous oppressions, it was a happy coincidence that these two strangers should be present at a meeting when the reply from the Foreign-office to the Committee's application should have been reported.

The Committee having, by the aid of Mr. B. H. Cowper, who kindly acted as interpreter, conferred with these brethren, they and their people were earnestly commended to the blessing of God in prayer, Presbyter Yohanan closing with the solemn repetition of the Lord's Prayer in his own tongue. These two friends have since returned home, in company with the Rev. Dr. Perkins, for many years missionary at Oroomiah, carrying with them a sum of money contributed by Christian people in England, to assist in relieving the necessities of those people. To this fund £26 16s. 8d. was contributed through the Evangelical Alliance.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN EGYPT.

During the recent visit to this country of the Viceroy of Egypt the following address was presented to him. It was intended that a deputation should wait upon his Highness to present the address, and he had signified his willingness to receive such deputation. Owing, however, to the shortness of notice, it was found impracticable to arrange a deputation for the day fixed, and the Hon. Charles Murray, therefore, kindly undertook to lay the address before the Viceroy.

The interesting facts of the case referred to in the third paragraph of the address are stated in a letter by the Rev. James Barnett, of the Egyptian Coptic Mission, dated April 12, 1862, and inserted in the eighth report of the Turkish Missions' Aid Society, p. 38; and also in the Official correspondence relating to the subject with the American Government, just published.

The address and reply are as follows:—

TO HIS HIGHNESS THE VICEROY OF EGYPT.

We, the undersigned, belonging to various bodies of Protestant Christians in Great Britain, gladly embrace this opportunity of approaching your Highness, with sentiments of high respect and sincere gratitude.

Deeply interested in the provisions made by the Hatti-Humaioun of 1856 for the protection of the subjects of the Turkish Empire acting according to their religious convictions, we beg to offer to your Highness our cordial acknowledgments for the evidences of your determination to act upon the same principles of just and benevolent toleration in the country under your rule.

It is greatly to our comfort and satisfaction that we have learned the interposition recently made under your Highness's authority on behalf of a native Christian who was suffering severely from a fanatical outbreak in the city of Siyut, for having undertaken to defend a native woman, herself also persecuted on account of religion.

We have likewise heard with pleasure that missionaries of all persuasions in Egypt have liberty to travel in the performance of their duties, free of charge, on the Government railways.

We rejoice to recognise in these facts, and in the general tone of your Highness's Government, a fixed determination on the part of your Highness to give effect to the great principles of religious freedom throughout the territories dependent upon your authority, and we earnestly pray that your Highness's life may long be spared to rule with increasing glory over a prosperous and devoted population.

London, July 18, 1862.

M. le Président,—I am both honoured and deeply touched by the sentiments of sympathy which you have expressed to me in the address which you transmitted to me yesterday; and I am happy that my conduct, in regard to the Christians of different communities, has been judged worthy of the approbation of the illustrious personages whose names appear at the foot of your address.

Although it has been a principle with me to grant an equal protection to all forms of worship, without distinction, the approbation of the distinguished members of your association will be an additional motive with me to persevere in the course which I have traced out for myself.

Be kind enough, M. le Président, to be the interpreter to the Evangelical Alliance of my sentiments of lively gratitude for the wishes which it kindly entertains for my preservation and prosperity, and to convey to it my perfect esteem and high consideration.

(Signed) MOHAMMED SAID.

A M. le Président de l'Alliance Evangelique, London.

As an additional proof of the sentiments of the Viceroy in questions of religious liberty, we cannot forbear quoting a letter addressed by him to the President of the United States with reference to the persecution at Siyut. It is as follows:—

Alexandria, Nov. 21, 1861.

To the Honourable Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States of America.

Honourable Sir and Friend,—Mr. Thayer, Consul-General of the United States at Alexandria, has presented me the letter you were pleased to write to me expressing your feelings of satisfaction for the punishment which I have inflicted on some individuals guilty of evil and cruel treatment towards an agent of certain Christian missionaries in Upper Egypt. Mr. Thayer, who, I am happy to say, entertains with me the most friendly relations, had already expressed to me the feelings of your Government.

In this case, honourable Sir and Friend, I have only executed the rule which I have always endeavoured to follow, in protecting in an equal way, and without consideration of creed, all those who, either by inclination or for the fulfilment of a duty, sojourn in the country submitted to my administration.

I am profoundly sensible of the friendly manner in which you express your sentiments both to myself and to my Government, and I pray you, honourable Sir and Friend, to accept, with this offering of my thanks, my sincere wishes for the success, perpetuity, and integrity of the American Union, which, I hope, under your able presidency, will soon see an end of the trials with which the Almighty has been pleased to afflict it.—Your most devoted friend,

GENEVA CONFERENCE.

Letters acknowledging the receipt of copies of the Geneva Conference Report, presented by the Committee of Council, have recently been received from Colonel Sir Charles Phipps, on the part of Her Majesty the Queen, from the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, the Bishops of Durham, Carlisle, Rochester, Ripon, and Down and Connor, the Earls of Chichester and Shaftesbury, Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, Lords Ebury and Darnley, the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford University, Sir Robert Peel, Bart, M.P., Hon. W. F. Cowper, M.P., Lord Mayor of London, Lord Provost of Glasgow, the Dean of Canterbury, Sir Morton Peto, Bart., M.P., Hon. W. Ashley, Frank Crossley, Esq., M.P., and the Principals of several theological colleges of different religious bodies.

DECEASE OF MEMBERS OF THE COUNCIL.

The death of the Rev. Dr. Leifohild and the Rev. Robert Eckett, two members of the Council, having been reported to the Committee, they in each case adopted a Resolution expressive of their sense of the loss sustained by themselves and the Church at large by the departure of these brethren in Christ. The former of these friends having been one of the founders of the Evangelical Alliance, we feel compelled to give in extenso the resolution adopted by the Committee on occasion of his lamented decease. It is as follows:—

Resolution.—In recording the decease of our venerable friend, the Rev. Dr. Leifohild, we cannot forbear an expression of the cordial affection and reverence with which we regard his character and labours, and while we gratefully call to mind the blessing vouchsafed by the Great Head of the Church to his faithful, zealous and gifted ministry of nearly half a century, we would especially recognise his services and honour his memory as one of the founders of the Evangelical Alliance. In common with his esteemed fellow-servants, Edward Bickersteth and John Angell James, he had long mourned over the divisions in the body of Christ, the want of visible fellowship among the members of the different Evangelical Churches, and of union with each other, for purposes of praise and prayer and the advancement of the Redeemer's cause.

His feelings and wishes being cordially responded to by a number of his Christian brethren, he held a devotional meeting in Craven Chapel, on the second day of the year 1843, in which many of their number, of different churches, esteemed it a privilege to take part; and the chord of brotherly love and unity having been once struck, its tones continued to vibrate, till the formation of the Evangelical Alliance, in August, 1846, gave a promise of the realisation of his earnest desire and hopes. Though the requirements of an extensive pastoral charge did not permit him to take an active part in the administration of its affairs, the Alliance continued to engage his cordial sympathy; and his judicious counsel and willing help were ever at its command. While, therefore, we affectionately condole with the family of our departed friend on the loss they have sustained, and with the branch of Christ's Church to which he was conscientiously attached, on the removal of an honoured servant, whose scriptural faith, Catholic spirit, and godly zeal were clearly manifested by his preaching, his writings, and his abundant labours, we cannot but grieve at the thought that the cause of Christian union has been deprived of one of its warmest and most consistent advocates by his translation to the heavenly rest. Meanwhile we gladly cherish the belief that, like his beloved friend, Joseph Hughes, of whose life and labours he has left a published memorial, and the revered guide of his early youth, Jabez Bunting, to whose wise and largehearted counsel he was so greatly indebted, and others, his fellow-labourers in the Gospel field, who "have gone forth weeping, bearing precious seed," he will, doubtless, "come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."

NEW BRANCH OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

At a meeting of Committee, July 17, 1862, a letter was read from the Rev. T. B. Penfield, dated Brainerd, Metcalf, Jamaica, 19th June, 1862, stating that, in accordance with letters of invitation sent to all evangelical ministers in the parishes of St. Mary Metcalf and St. Thomas-in-the-Vale, eleven brethren, the representatives of various religious communities, had met, on the 6th of May previous, and had formed a branch of the Evangelical Alliance, and requesting that they might be recognised accordingly. The Committee passed a resolution expressing their satisfaction at the formation of this new branch of the Alliance.

COMMUNICATION FROM NEW ZEALAND.

The Committee thankfully acknowledge the receipt of 5*l.* contributed to the funds of the Evangelical Alliance by five clergymen labouring in New Zealand in connexion with the Church Missionary Society. The remittance was accompanied with an encouraging letter, of which the following is an extract:—

We beg your acceptance of a trifling gift in aid of the good cause in which you are so manfully engaged. The catholic spirit manifested by those who have connected themselves with your labours pleasingly indicates the root from whence your exertions have sprung, and unmistakeably points to Jesus, our blessed Master, as unto you the way, the truth, and the life. The largeness of your views, the breadth of your labours, and the sympathy shown by so many different churches, are bright features in your evangelical career, and our united prayers are that, guided by the gracious influences of the Holy Ghost, you may go on, as you have hitherto done, in the love of the Father and the spirit of Christ.

DR. DAVIDSON'S INTRODUCTION TO THE OLD TESTAMENT.*

THERE are many signs around us to show that the time is not far distant when the Old Testament will become a general subject of critical study. Some grammatical and historical commentaries have appeared within the last few years in England, and give hope of a better day, when a thorough knowledge of the Hebrew language may be more widely diffused among Biblical students, the foundation of which can only be laid by a systematic and scientific study of its grammar.

IN Germany many so-called introductions to the Old Testament have appeared, while in England books of this kind have been generally unknown, with the exception of the work of Rev. T. H. Horne. His volumes embraced far too wide a circle to permit of accuracy or of much criticism, and accordingly—on the critical questions connected with the individual books, especially of the Old Testament—its information was generally too meagre. Into the merits of the revised edition of that work, published in 1856, by Mr. Horne, in connexion with Dr. Tregelles and Dr. Davidson, we do not mean to enter, nor to touch upon the controversy raised by the publication of the volume on the Old Testament, which had been committed to the care of the latter scholar. Most of our readers at all interested in Biblical studies will remember that the charge of neology was brought against Dr. Davidson, which resulted in his resignation of the Professorship of Biblical Literature then held by him in the Lancashire Independent College, and in the issue of a duplicate volume on the Old Testament, drawn up by Rev. J. Ayre, to complete the revised series of Horne's Introduction.

The work before us now is quite independent of its predecessor; and is considerably in advance of it, both as to the views adopted, and as to the treatment of its subjects. Though we are very far indeed from coinciding with the opinions here advocated, we cannot but view it as an important contribution to our Biblical literature. We are, however, sorry to perceive throughout it a considerable amount of bitterness manifested against those with whom he disagrees, which was no doubt engendered by the mode in which the author was treated by men far his inferiors on the occasion of his former publication.

In illustration of this we would just cite one passage:—

The question is firmly established on critical grounds, that two documents at least are incorporated into the present Pentateuch—documents in many respects different, and sometimes contradictory. It may suit an atmosphere of ignorance to reproduce the uncritical, far-fetched apologies of Hengstenberg, Hävernicks, Keil, and Kurtz, in opposition to settled results; but as soon as a little light shines, their emptiness appears. . . . It may harmonise with the temper of religious sectaries in England to denounce men like Bleek, Tuch, De Wette, Ewald, Hupfeld, and Knobel, as irreligious or sceptical, because they have carefully investigated the subject, and honestly expressed their views upon it; but who are their judges? Are smatterers in Hebrew the persons to lament over such men's treatment of questions that have nothing to do with religion, as though it were irreligious? Is it a heinous heresy to be out of the pale of what is called evangelicalism? Fortunate indeed it is that they are out of the pale of that intolerable evangelicalism which thanks God, in the spirit of the Pharisee who went up to the temple to pray. As long as the stale attempts of Hengstenberg and his school to uphold the Mosaic authorship of the whole Pentateuch are dealt out in small doses in Great Britain, the criticism of the Old Testament is retarded, and a barrier set up against the tide of enlightened opinion which must soon be swept away. . . . A man may believe too much as well as too little. He may believe till he has earned and unworthy notions of the Almighty, thinking Him to have so interested in the petty affairs of His creatures as to speak audibly to them in the air, and even to appear in human form: he may make the Deity in his own image, and think that religion: but these anthropomorphic conceptions are infinitely more dishonouring to Jehovah than any rational treatment of records which unfold the spiritual development of the Jewish race at an early period of their history. Declamation, invective, pietistic horror, orthodox pity for the infidel Germans, answer no purpose but to impose on the vulgar; and as insertions in religious works, are utterly out of place. "Who art thou, that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth. Yea, he shall be holden up: for God is able to make him stand." Censorious judging, cowardly insinuation, uncharitable suspicion, stealing others' good name and character, constitute the religion of many. Happy will it be for them if it takes them to heaven sooner than the sceptics they hate.

We do not deny that there is some truth contained in these remarks, especially in the protest here made against the declamation and invective which too readily takes the place of candid discussion. But cannot such a charge be retorted on our author? It is, perhaps, only fair to say that this is not the usual style of the book. But passages like the above show that its author is not free from prepossessions which must influence very materially his treatment of the Biblical books. A scholar who can in so sweeping a manner condemn as "carnal and unworthy notions of the Almighty" any belief in the Almighty speaking from heaven or appearing in human form, cannot be expected to treat accounts of such phenomena in Scripture as anything else than mere myths and legends.

Dr. Davidson's theory of inspiration, as far as we can discover it, is set forth in pp. 129-130, where he says:—

There is an erroneous idea abroad that persons who wrote books preserved in the canon were the only inspired individuals. All religious men were counted inspired, under the Old Testament dispensation; some possessing a larger measure of the Spirit than others. Moses was not the only inspired person of his time. He had successors who were inspired as well as he, though not to the same extent. But the authority of sacred writings has no connexion with names. Unknown persons may have had the Spirit of God in a larger degree than those with whose names we are acquainted. If the divinity of a book depended on the name of a writer, the book could be nothing more than human. The Divine would then be personal and individual. But truth is independent of persons. No historical loss affects it. Hence revelation can lose nothing by a critical rejection of the Mosaic authority of the Pentateuch. What work, containing a Divine revelation, must have a value independent of authority derived from authorship. A Divine revelation is not such because of the person who conveys it in writing, but because it contains Divine truth. The process, therefore, of judging the credibility of a Divine revelation is not an historical, but religious, thing. It is subjective and ideal, not objective. The opponents of criticism lament their historical loss in not possessing a narrative contemporaneous with the events, instead of later traditions. But the loss is a gain, if criticism gives forth historical truth; and if it does not, let its baselessness be shown. To build the authority of revelation on the untrue, can answer no good purpose.

From this notion about inspiration, as of so ordinary a character, we may know what kind of treatment certain passages must necessarily receive. One of Dr. Davidson's principles of interpretation is, as set forth on p. 168, that "every part of Scripture must be explained in such a manner as is consistent with right reason and the known attributes of the Deity. Just conceptions of the Supreme Being should precede and regulate the method of exposition." What is, however, the "right reason" we are thus to explain Scripture by? Are we to reject everything that does not fall in with our ordinary experience? Is the reason to be altogether subjective? May we not, in accordance with right reason, believe that God manifested Himself in a different manner to the fathers than He has done to us? or is everything, or nearly everything, supernatural to be judged by us as merely mythical and legendary? As Dr. Davidson has gone so far as to deny that the law was delivered audibly to Moses on Mount Sinai, and to assert that it was rather the result of the religious convictions guided by Divine Providence, which were working in the mind of the legislator himself, it is plain that such a notion would make strange havoc with the Sacred Scriptures.

The grounds on which Dr. Davidson professes himself dissatisfied with the common opinion that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch consist mainly of a number of places which, he considers, contain "notices historical, geographical, archæological, and explanatory," adverse to such a view, and of certain diversities and contradictions which are found in the books, besides many instances of confusedness, coupled with the repetitions which from time to time occur. We say mainly, because there are other subordinate arguments which he adduces.

Let us take an instance or two of passages which are supposed to conflict with the Mosaic authorship—e.g., Gen. xii. 6, "And the Canaanite was then in the land," and ch. xiii. 7, "And the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelled then in the land." "These words," says Davidson, "obviously imply, that when the writer lived the Canaanites and the Perizzites had been expelled from the land." Hengstenberg, on the contrary, maintains that they can be explained in the several connexions in which they stand; but to do so, he is forced to consider the word then (im), in both cases, to have been interpolated. A second passage of this kind is that in Gen. xxxvi. 31, "And these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel." The last clause is suspicious: it could hardly have been written till there had been a king over Israel. Hengstenberg, indeed, considers there is a reference in it to the promise of kings coming out of the loins of Jacob, in ch. xxxv. 11; but this is most unsatisfactory. Davidson seems unnecessarily to suspect that the list of these Edomite kings before Moses is incomplete; for he says, "it may perhaps reach up almost to the time of Moses. It is impossible, however, to show that it reached to his time." One other passage may suffice—namely, Deut. ii. 12, "The Horims also dwelt in Seir beforetime; but the children of Esau succeeded them, when they had destroyed them from before them, and dwelt in their stead; as Israel did unto the land of their possession, which the Lord gave unto them." The last clause at least does not appear one which could well have been written by Moses. Hengstenberg, however, sees no difficulty. He says: "It was intended by these examples to show Israel that existing things were not unalterable. What in the common course of things had already happened frequently, under the guidance of the Lord, might it not also again occur where the special providence of God was at work?" But he seems to forget that the passage does not state that the thing might occur, but had already occurred. It is possible (but Hengstenberg does not adduce this) that the reference might have been made to the land on the east of Jordan, which had already come into the possession of Israel. We cannot, however, say it is probable. The words seem to have a more extended reference.

Such are a few out of many passages which do not appear likely to have come from the pen of Moses. The older scholars regarded them as interpolations, proceeding perhaps from Ezra, the reputed arranger of the canon of the Old Testament, or from some of his associates. Davidson regards this hypothesis as justly abandoned. Hengstenberg and many of his school are unfavourable to it. Davidson asserts that the passages in question "belong to their respective connexions as much as any other part of the text, and cannot be pronounced later appendages. They are not all explanatory. Some add nothing to the perspicuity of the places in which they occur; on the contrary, they occasionally disturb and embarrass the sequence." If the latter statement be true, how can it be said, "they belong to their respective connexions as much as any other part of the text?" If the former, how can it be asserted that "they disturb and embarrass the sequence?" We are inclined to coincide with the old scholars. Interpolations need not be explanatory. It by no means follows that because the Jews of the middle ages were so superstitiously careful about the text, that the Jews before the Babylonish captivity held the same opinions. Glosses explanatory of old terms, of ancient names of places, and referring to prophetic fulfilments, may have been easily admitted. Why may not the clause in Gen. xxxvi. 31 have been interpolated from 1 Chron. i. 43, where it occurs in a somewhat different connexion? Neither Davidson nor Hengstenberg make any reference to this fact.

"Diversities, confusedness, and contradictions also discountenance unity of authorship." So says Dr. Davidson; but we cannot give him credit for candour in all the instances he adduces. For example, he says—and on this point we quote his entire remark—"The Israelites did not listen to Moses at first for anguish of spirit and cruel bondage. (Ex. vi. 9—12.) But in iv. 31 they believed and rejoiced when he announced deliverance to them. It may be said that the elders were the persons spoken to in the latter case, not the people; and that they were induced to believe in him by the signs he wrought. But if the heads of the people were convinced of his Divine mission, the people groaning under their burdens would be ready to follow them."

The narrative contains no contradiction whatever. Moses and Aaron, having received their commission from God, came to the oppressed Israelites, and "Aaron spake all the words which the Lord had spoken unto Moses, and did the signs in the sight of the people." (Ex. iv. 30.) The people then "believed and rejoiced." But what followed? Moses and Aaron appeared before Pharaoh, and made their demands, and the result was, more work was laid upon the unfortunate Israelites. No wonder that, seeing this, and perceiving no relief—no miracle having been performed in their behalf—they, in their blindness, hesitated to put credence in the words of Moses Nor does there appear to us any ground whatever to assert, with Dr. Davidson, that there is a contradiction between Ex. vi. 2, where Moses received as it were a second time his commission in Egypt, and Ex. iii. 1, where it is said he received his commission in Midian. "Had not," says Dr. Davidson, "Moses visited the king to ask for the thing he was called by God to effect, we might reasonably suppose that the call was repeated; but since he did so, a second call was unnecessary. The two calls are in reality the narrations of different writers, giving a somewhat different version of the same thing." Was there no reason for repeating the commission, when it appeared so unsuccessful? Pharaoh had not only refused to hearken, but the Israelites, who were at first inclined favourably to Moses, now had refused to listen to him. Not one of the mighty wonders which the Lord had spoken of had been performed—Jehovah had not delivered His people at all. Does the fact that "the one represents Moses as asking for a temporary release of the people, the other for their entire deliverance," prove a diversity of writers, when, although Moses was directed by God at first to ask only for a temporary release, at that very same time he was informed that Israel would be completely delivered from the bondage of Egypt. The subsequent narratives in chap. viii. 25—30 and x. 8, 9, prove that the temporary respite was only demanded in order to put Pharaoh to the test.

Candour is certainly a rare virtue. We do not deny that the want of it has been too plainly manifested by the defenders of the Pentateuch, but we do assert that its absence has been as striking on the part of the opponents of the Mosaic authorship. We wait yet to see a candid work by a competent scholar, which will fairly state the difficulties (for difficulties there unquestionably are) on both sides of the question, and which will point out the many passages on which candid critics may hold different opinions.

The evidence of the New Testament, though primâ facie decidedly in favour of the Mosaic authorship, may possibly be viewed as not altogether decisive on the point. It might be said that our Lord and His Apostles, in a matter of inferior moment, spoke in accordance with the prevalent opinion of the Jews. If the Pentateuch be considered to have proceeded, if not entirely, at least in great part, from Moses, or to have contained substantially his law, and to have included his genuine prophecies, this supposition would be admissible. But if the work be viewed, with Dr. Davidson, as replete with legendary stories and myths, as recording false miracles and containing gross exaggerations, such a view cannot possibly harmonise with the use our blessed Lord—who was the Truth—made of it. And we do not see how it is possible to coincide with the following remark of Dr. Davidson, and yet hold the cardinal point of the divinity of the Lord Jesus, though Dr. Davidson sees no incongruity:—

It should also be observed, that historical and critical questions could only belong to the sphere of His human culture—a culture stamped with the characteristics of His age and country. The development of Jesus is distinctly recognised in the New Testament, and is not incompatible with His Divine nature (Luke ii. 25). Considering, therefore, the human limitations to which the Son of God was subjected on earth, we are not irreverent in supposing that He shared the common views of the Jews in His day, in regard to points ethically or doctrinally unimportant.

Much yet has to be done for the criticism of the Pentateuch. We want for the purpose candid and critical scholars. It is not fair that a scholar should be shackled by common opinion; but, at the same time, to prove that he is a free inquirer, he need not necessarily run counter to it. We believe in the Mosaic authorship of the main portion of the Pentateuch, but we do not see why Moses should not have made use of prior documents (it is evident he did), and why later writers may not have added portions to the work. This is confessedly the case with at least the last chapter of Deuteronomy. Has not this principle been too much overlooked? The acquaintance the writer had with Egypt and its customs points to the time of Moses. Some chapters, too, seem to have been penned by an eye-witness of the events recorded. Others point to later times—a later editor may have made certain additions. Portions of Moses' writings may have been lost. Thus the gap of thirty-eight years which are passed over in silence may be explained. It need not necessarily have been an extensive portion. Glosses to explain names may have been added. All may have been done under the supervision of the prophets. We may admit, with Dr. Davidson, that "there is no important difference between the language of the Pentateuch and that of the other books written shortly before the return of the Israelites from the captivity in Babylon." The phenomenon would be unparalleled if we likewise admitted (as has been taken for granted) that we have the Pentateuch and those books in the same form in which they were first written, with all their grammatical peculiarities. But cannot this be reasonably doubted? The vowel punctuation does not ascend higher than the fifth century after Christ, the use of vowel-letters cannot be proved of higher antiquity than say four or five centuries before Christ. The grammar is all of one age; the various peculiarities traceable in the books may, perhaps, be rather ascribed to difference of punctuators. The punctuation must have been a slow work. It must have been gone through several stages. We have no old Hebrew; its forms must have been modernised, after an ancient tradition, no doubt, but still comparatively modern. We doubt whether the grammatical forms can be proved to ascend higher than two centuries before the Babylonish captivity.

The fact is, we believe, all sides have been equally in error. The orthodox may learn much from the Rationalists, the Rationalists from the orthodox. There is truth on both sides, but all sides seem afraid of it. It would spoil some favourite theories of the Rationalists to demand proofs for every stage in their argumentation. The orthodox are too fearful of thorough investigation. Against an infallible Pope the Reformers put forward an infallible Bible, with an infallible text. There was a great truth at the bottom of all this, but it was pushed too far. We are not afraid of the Bible suffering from candid and searching investigation. The results of criticism no doubt deeply affect the faith of the Church. This is not "the cant of uneducated minds." But they will not affect it injuriously. The truths on which the Church is founded will stand for ever, and in the end with firmer faith men will "stand in the old ways." There will be no new Gospel discovered by which the many will be saved instead of the few. Scripture, examined and tested in the crucibles of both the lower and the higher criticism, will still bear evidence to the great truth—the truth—that it is "not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost; which He shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour; that being justified by His grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life."

We take leave here, at least for the present, of Dr. Davidson's Introduction, which we cannot but consider the ablest, boldest, and most uncompromising onslaught on the authority of the Old Testament books that has yet appeared in England. We hope and trust it may stir up the upholders of their authority to do something as able in their defence. It can be done. Shall it be left any longer undone?

M. LOMBARD, OF GENEVA, ON THE LORD'S-DAY.*

Section I.—Origin of the Society Founded at Geneva for the Sanctification of the Lord's-day.

Who among our English brethren who attended the assemblies of 1861 does not recollect the introductions to those meetings, when, under the influence of a serene sky, and nature all resplendent, there was established among all the members of the society, both visitors and fellow-citizens, often strangers to one another, and of many different denominations, a sweet and ready intercourse, a cordial and fraternal intimacy? Who will have forgotten the holy vibrations of the hymns which resounded beneath the vaulted roofs of the ancient cathedra!—vibrations which were communicated to the hearts of those who were present? Who will have forgotten the subdued light which is peculiar to these noble monuments of antiquity, and which, gliding beneath the vaulted roof, was shed upon an attentive and compact audience? Who will forget that amphitheatre of grave and peaceful forms,—those foreheads blanched by labour and vigils in the service of their heavenly Master,—that assembly of men of every tribe, of every language, of every rank, whose rallying cry was the cross of their Saviour God? Gathered at the call of the venerable champions for the truth which Geneva counts within her walls, they came to testify before the face of the Christian world, that beneath the ecclesiastical denominations, of which the Alliance acknowledges the free profession, the same faith unites them in their diversity. If we have not here the visible and universal Church, we cannot fail to recognise that here are the first outlines of the edifice of which "God manifest in the flesh" is the Architect and Founder, and of which He is the chief corner stone.

But these first impressions necessarily rose to a more lofty diapason, in proportion as the roll of speakers, and the order of the subjects treated, came to unfold the holy studies to which these assemblies had given occasion, and developed in written or extemporary addresses the considerations and the data of evangelical and social science, in relation to the wants of the time and the aim of the meetings.

To Professor Godet, of Neuchatel, pertained, in fact, the important mission of reminding the Christians at that moment assembled, that the first of the practical duties which the Alliance proposed to bring into clearer light was the question of "The Lord's-day, and the Means for Promoting its Sanctification." To this memoir, the echoes of which were not confined to the vault of St. Peter's, and to the views which it consecrates—to this appeal to Christian consciences, under the impulse of the addresses which followed it, among which I will name that of the Rev. Dr. Thomson, so full of interest and of life—are due, after God, the movements with which I am now called to occupy you and the society which has been founded at Geneva.

* Notes Relative to the Formation of Societies for the Sanctification of the Lord's-day at Geneva and in Switzerland, with Considerations upon the Possible Development of these Agencies. By M. Alexandre Lombard, of Geneva. Read at the Conference of the Evangelical Alliance, at Freemasons' Hall, October 16, 1862.

In effect, the last vibrations of the solemn voice which had pronounced this discourse had not died away, when some brethren, among whom was my dear and respected friend, the President of the English Branch, communicated the impressions which they had received, and said, "You must put your hand to the work!" The appeal had been uttered at Geneva, and it was for Geneva to be the first to respond to it. And, in fact, how much does our dear native country need it! For we well remember the announcements then placarded on the walls, of pleasure trains, of clamorous fêtes, and of great gatherings of troops arranged for the Sunday in a neighbouring canton—the works carried on both public and private, and the astonishment of our foreign brethren at seeing how our public manners authorised abuse, and our private manners remissness in this respect. It was a strange and painful spectacle to be witnessed in one of the cradles of the Reformation, formerly so celebrated for its religious life; and much more sad yet, if we reflect how the example set by Christians authorises worldly men in the guilty abandonment of the day which God has reserved to Himself.

This was felt, and the meetings were not concluded before a first nucleus of Genevese members of the Alliance proceeded to the formation of a committee; and then, with brethren come from Switzerland, they drew the outlines of a future Swiss association, reserved till the moment when circumstances should appear propitious, and meanwhile promising to lend their aid to the formation of cantonal associations, with the Lords'-day as their object.

When this was done, a note was sent to the President of the Alliance by a brother belonging to Geneva, to announce to him that the committee was prepared to occupy itself with this work, and to request the adhesion of the Alliance. In the course of the session the ensuing reply was received. I quote it textually, because it distinctly marks out the limits of the part taken by the Alliance in external works, and how it confines itself to the encouragement of the formation of works which the kingdom of God requires, and to giving them their first impulse, but does not execute them. Here is the reply: "The movement imparted by the report of M. Godet is sufficient; as an act of intervention this has given the first impulse; the work has only to go forward of itself.*"

This is what was done.

As soon as the repose necessary after days so well filled up had been taken, the friends who had embraced this work re-assembled; and conferences followed. The question, in effect, related to the taking of a critical and delicate step, and one which consisted in reconciling principles, which, without diverging from the basis of the necessary sanctification of the Lord's-day, or the perpetuity of the institution of one day of rest in seven, differ as to the scriptural interpretation of the fourth commandment.

With some this point of departure is absolute, but others regard it in its relation to the rights of evangelical liberty (Rom. viii. 20; 1 Peter ii. 16; Gal. v. 1; James i. 25), and to passages where our Lord, by abolishing the Jewish theocracy, has inaugurated a new covenant of love and grace, and where the spirit substituted for the letter has taken the place of the legal observance. (Mark ii. 27, 28; 1 Cor. x. 29; Col. ii. 16.)

We could not be divided as to the starting point, and in agreement as to the foundation; it was needful to arrive at a scheme which should reconcile the two points of view. This was the more needful, because, in fact, through not having adopted them simultaneously, and through being grounded exclusively upon the fourth commandment, a society founded in a neighbouring city has seen its influence diminish, and has provoked publications and a reaction, the sad effects of which are still felt among Christians.

It was needful, then, first of all, to establish this double truth, that not only is the institution of the Day of Rest a Divine prescription, typically at least, anterior to the law (Gen. ii. 3), but a means of grace which God, in the person of Adam, had willed to secure to the whole of humanity; and, that it is not permitted to man to neglect it without peril to both soul and body, and without coming into collision with the royal law of charity.

In the second place, that the fourth commandment has done nothing but confirm this institution of the seventh day rest, in order to its sanctification.

Finally, that the Lord's-day, substituted for the Sabbath as a sequence of the resurrection of Jesus Christ, satisfied this ordinance, by consecrating it as the day of the Lord; and that the setting apart of this day realises the Divine idea, and consecrates the right of every man to rest one day in seven, that of the Church to public worship, and the duty of all to sanctify it.

It was also needful to decide the limits which our Lord, and His Apostles after Him, have imposed upon this observation, and to indicate, at least in principle, that there are cases in which the imperious necessities of existence and the duties of charity can modify it in as far as this can be done in His name and for His service. (See Matthew xii. 1—14; Mark ii. 23—25, iii. 1—5; Luke vi. 1—10, xiii. 10—16, xiv. 1—6; and John ix. 13—16.)

Finally, after having laid down these principles, it was requisite to develop their practical consequences, and to recommend all who are convinced of their truth to search their ways in this regard, to act upon themselves, and then to seek to re-establish around them respect for this holy day, by associating with such as partake of these convictions, in order to labour in common to spread the knowledge of the duties and privileges attached to the day. Such are the principal features which had to be summed up; and although we cannot say that the scheme adopted is not susceptible of improvement, it nevertheless seems to me to have defined the essential points, and to be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the two opinions. I add to this memoir, for those who wish to consult it, the statement of principles in question.*

* See the scheme at the end of this paper.

These bases having been laid, and in accordance with the promoters of the work, the question was to get them accepted by others. They were adopted at a select preliminary meeting, chosen from the influential members of the churches of the two denominations on Sunday, November 3, the very day and moment when others of our brethren were labouring and praying for the same object in other parts of Switzerland. It was decided that a more numerous meeting should be called. Fifty persons, friends of the institution, therefore assembled on the 17th of the same month, and after some discussion the statement of principles was almost unanimously adopted. A committee was nominated, in which, according to the principles of the Alliance, there were members of the Established and Independent Churches, laymen and pastors, among whom figured several who are well known at Geneva and loved in England—of such as are interested in the kingdom of God. But since, in questions pertaining to this kingdom, persons are of no account, you will excuse me from naming them.

Such were the beginnings of our society; and if I have allowed myself to record them with some details, it has been, perhaps, a little through the need I feel of expressing the sentiments which animated me at that memorable and blessed period—sentiments which I believe still respond to those of many hearts. It is also to recall the part which the Evangelical Alliance has had in this creation, and which it ought to have in the prayers of our English brethren at this time assembled. In the last place, it is, above all, because it may serve to encourage others to labour in the same field, and to prepare the way for a more extended movement.

Now see what has been done.

Section II.—The First Labours of the Society.

As soon as the society was constituted, the moment was come to extend its basis, and to secure the co-operation of all the friends of the work in Geneva. Public meetings were called for this object in different places; they brought together a numerous and thoroughly sympathising public. The higher classes, I regret to say—whether they did not believe themselves directly involved, or through want of interest, or any other cause—showed themselves less than the more obscure ranks of society, and it is to be remarked that the adhesions, which came in great number, belonged for the most part to the working classes. We may observe, in passing, that the adhesions which our committee asked for did not at all resemble the pledges or engagements of temperance societies, which, in a question of this kind, would have resulted in a sort of assault upon the rights of evangelical liberty, and would have gone beyond the prescriptions of the Word of God. They only went so far as to express the following principle, which makes no appeal except to a moral assent, and not a written one: "That the members adhere for their part to the principles of the sanctification of the Lord's-day, and that they will labour to extend its observance."

The aim of these meetings was to call public attention to the subject, and to awaken consciences. This end was pursued in a series of sermons which were preached simultaneously in the national and free churches; and I feel it my duty to say that we obtained on that occasion from the representative bodies of the two churches, and in particular from the national con-history, which has very often occupied itself with this question, very favourable co-operation.

It is not mine to be able to say that the work has subsequently struck deep roots. The evil is too profound and of too old a date; the habits which are necessarily influenced by the manners of the neighbouring provinces, where the evil is, I believe I can say, still greater, are too deeply rooted in connexion with the successive decline of doctrine and of faith, and the invasion of foreign usages, for us to hope for some time for any prompt and perceptible reformation. I will say, however, without pretending to dive into men's hearts, or to judge what has passed in the privacy of their houses, that we may believe that in many instances these appeals have not been heard in vain; and that, whether in regard to a more real sanctification of this day, or to the reformation of some more manifest abuses, the efforts of our society have not been absolutely fruitless. I am able to affirm that at least in many Christian families an employment of the Lord's-day more in accordance with its holiness has commenced, and that among the industrial and trading classes many persons have been convicted in their consciences, have renounced Sunday labour, and have shut their shops, which had hitherto been open on that day.

Some results of a character yet more tangible have been obtained by the direct or indirect endeavours of our committee. Without entering into all the details, it will suffice for me to indicate, among others, the building operations, which employ a numerous staff of workmen, and in which not only has rest prevailed on the Lord's-day, but—and this is an essential circumstance, and one of which the general practice cannot be too strongly recommended—rest has been sometimes guaranteed in the agreements adopted with the contractors. It is not useless to observe that these who have established this practice have had the satisfaction to record the entire approval of their subordinates, workmen and foremen. "They have done well" (on a bien fait), has been the simple and significant expression which has been heard the very day after the measure.

Certain measures of a more individual character, but still under the impulse of our committee, always in prospect of the moral and physical well-being of the employed, and of the labourer, and without emerging from the domain of gradual and possible reforms, have been also taken in regard to great industrial companies, directors of municipal and State works, and the delegates for the administration of the Federal posts. Although the result has certainly not yet answered our expectation, I can assure you that these representations have been always well received, and I am assured, in consequence, that the concurrence of a large number of administrators and functionaries will be secured to us, when we present to them practical reforms for them to study and to introduce in relation to this matter. But we have found a much more favourable reception where we did not hope for it, and that is in the two most important branches of industry in our city—watch-making and jewellery. Conferences with the heads of factories, and of important houses in these branches, whether they were consulted personally or in groups, have brought out the following essential points, upon which their assent has been almost unanimous:—

- I. That Sunday labour brings no profit, and involves the vexatious still of Monday.

2. That respect for Sunday has at present rather a tendency to increase; or, at least, to be tolerated—a remarkable symptom of progress amid the tyranny which a pretended rationalistic Voltarian liberalism has but too long exercised among our industrial population over all who would think and act otherwise than the majority.

3. That the closing of the workshops on Saturday evening now depends upon the masters much more than formerly; the claims of the workmen being now less apparent, in consequence of the actual hardness of the times and the small amount of work which there is in consequence.

4. That a reform has already been commenced in numerous establishments, and that it is thought possible and desirable for it to become general, not only on moral grounds, but in view of the very results of labour.

5. That Sunday closing is advantageous to the domestic circle, to the morality of families, and to the health of the working man.*

6. That some steps relative, for instance, to the payment of wages on a Friday—by the fortnight, or by the month, in preference to Sunday morning, or even to Saturday night—would tend to preserve the (Divine) institution, and to profit the working man. Very often, in fact, the wives have to wait for the time of paying before they can procure bread for their children. If the payment has been made at its proper time, the housekeeper has been able to do her marketing and to remain at home on Sunday morning, the better to draw there the all-important presence of the head of the family, and to occupy herself with her children. When the first hour of the Lord's-day is thus spent in the family, it will favour its more salutary employment.

7. That the establishment of places of resort (salles d'asyle) for working men, on the the Lord's-day, would be a desirable institution.

Finally, a general encouragement to persevere in this work, and proof that the time is judged propitious, has been granted to the committee through these men of business, among whom are found Protestants, and some Catholics, and persons of different political opinions.

Such is a rapid summary of our winter campaign. But it is not only at Geneva that efforts have been made; communications have been exchanged with different parts of Switzerland, which we might judge to be the best disposed to receive them. A society already existed at Neuchatel, and we have instituted relations with it. At Lausanne, and at Schaffhausen, societies having the same views as ours have been formed, and we have recently received from Basle notice of the formation of a committee there for the same object. We know that at Berne, at Zurich, at Coire, and elsewhere, this question occupies attention, and letters which we have received from them leave no doubt in our minds, that sooner or later it will be taken into serious and practical consideration there also.

So much for the facts. Let us now say a few words of what we are permitted to discern as to the development of the work.

Section III.—Of the Future, and of the Development of the Work at Geneva and in Switzerland.

The facts which I have now set forth are, it is true, small and inconsiderable in presence of the extent of the social evil which surrounds us. But with the help of God, and although we bear the light in earthen vessels, we hope gradually to advance. I know not what results will follow the campaign about to be commenced, but the encouragements which have attended our first efforts, and the increasingly lively sense of the importance of this work, and of the practical and Christian justice of the principles which have guided us, permit us to hope that we shall still gain ground, and that in proportion as it is better understood the prejudices which attend it among the public and before many good men, and even Christians, will be dissipated.

If we have been able to indicate some favourable dispositions at home, we do not disguise from ourselves that everything remains to be done, for amid so many contrary influences consciences soon become lax. Here, above all, we must endeavour, not only by sounding the alarm upon the bad influence of relaxation and example, but by reviving the taste for the things of God, and also by disseminating practical and salutary counsels as to the employment of this day. We shall also persevere, if it please God, in efforts which, without touching directly upon the sanctification of the day, and which have an apparent character of utilitarianism, have none the less an essential aim—namely, the amelioration of the condition of the working man and the employed, to whatever social order he belongs. To labour in this field is, in a word, to have for our aim to contribute to the moral elevation of society, to reconstruct the family, and directly to prepare the way for the recovery of souls.

But if the work at home demands all the care and all the perseverance of our society, it would, in my opinion, remain very incomplete if it did not seek to extend itself beyond our frontiers. It is of the nature of every useful and Christian enterprise to propagate its influence, and, in a word, to become missionary. The evil has come to us from abroad in great part; let us try to combat it abroad. We shall do so if God please. Perhaps I here outrun the intentions of our committee, but I feel assured that many persons think as I do. First of all, before venturing to attempt efforts beyond the limits of our little country, we shall use them with our fellow-citizens and brethren of Switzerland, stimulating, by all the means that Providence permits, the formation of new cantonal committees, and, if possible, a Swiss society.

Why, in fact, should we limit our field of labour? Our principles, which are removed from a formal Sabbatarianism, and which have a character as evangelical as it is practical, can be propagated. They cannot but be salutary to souls, and their direct aim being the sanctification of the Lord's-day in liberty, might bring down many prejudices and fears which still cling to this question. I like to think, at least, that whether the movement begins from here or elsewhere, this Divine institution, which like a majestic river has crossed the ages of the world, and which has been sustained under the Christian era, amid so many different phases, will go on amplifying under the breath of the Spirit, in proportion as the domain of grace shall be substituted for that of the law, and the kingdom of our Saviour take its place in men's hearts and upon earth.

But what conflicts lie between! And if we look at ourselves, we ask ourselves if we are really sufficient for these things, even in the restricted field which is more especially committed to us. May Christians comprise all its importance! May they unite with us to promote its development, and to assist this holy mission, which will be fruitful in blessings temporal as well as spiritual!

But it would not be enough to indicate the end, and not to indicate some of the means by which it can be attained. Let me be allowed to point out one among the rest. An immense evil engages my attention; it is, in the first place, the deleterious influence exercised by the growing centralisation of industry in the hands of great companies, which are more jealous of their own interests and of rapid profits than of the well-being of the labouring classes whom they employ. In the next place (the evil) is that of Governments who call themselves Christian, but who, nevertheless, are very indifferent to this matter, and to the moral well-being of their subjects, and who encourage or tolerate on the Lord's-day public works not indispensable, reviews or great gatherings of troops, electioneering business, fêtes, and pleasures of the most boisterous description.

Both these classes must be acted upon.

As for the former, we must be able to show them that the interests they manage are always in agreement with those of the agents they employ. Even if it were not so, moral and social interests would require of every manager that he should promote the well-being of the labourer as well as his own. His conscience is interested in it, and he cannot withdraw from it except at the peril of his soul.

The railway companies, in particular, with the power which they acquire, and the monopoly which they command, are surely interested in maintaining among their servants a level of morality which they cannot rise to without the regular practice of worship and a weekly, or at least a periodical rest, which is conducive to the welfare of the body, and allows of domestic enjoyment. The selfishness of shareholders, and the tyranny of majorities, would go to kill both the body and the soul of their servants, by demanding of them a forced and continued labour, which deprives them of the physical and moral unbending to which Providence decided the right of every man at the origin of humanity. Woe to them, if they take no heed to it, for abuses and oppressions are always followed by reactions. Those obscure and inexplicable discontents, those unexpected outbreaks against morality, those strikes of the workmen, those terrible postal robberies, those Sunday accidents, and those riots even, which sometimes take you by surprise, may all have their hidden roots in this continuous and godless work, this social injustice, and this ill-made reckoning between the workmen and their masters.

By enervating the body of the working man; by depriving him of his lawful rest; and by keeping away his soul from his Creator; the seeds of drunkenness, theft, and profligacy are sown—and recruits are obtained for workhouses, for houses of correction, for the hulks, and, perhaps, for the scaffold.

How many examples could be cited in support of what I have now said? If space permitted me, it would be easy for me to prove how more and more deplorable are, and will be, the effects of an industrial centralisation, which goes on increasing, unless the regulation of the Lord's-day comes in to check its development.

But how advise such a reform? and how will isolated societies succeed in it, if the protecting influence of the State does not come to their aid? Here is an objection which I have often heard made: it is that in our age of liberty the State is not called upon to intervene in questions which have a religious bearing, and in ours less than in any other. In my view, however, the legitimacy of such intervention is not doubtful. In effect, any law in favour of social well-being is incontestably within the direct jurisdiction of the State. If it occupies itself with the fate of children in manufactories; if it disturbs itself about the sale of spirituous liquors on the Sunday; if it favours savings banks; if it prevents polygamy, and concerns itself in general with any reform favourable to the welfare of the society of which it is the natural guardian—why should it not in regard to the one which concerns us? Why should it not pre-occupy itself more than it does with the abuses and evils which are engendered by a perverted civilisation? Why should it not provoke some legislative measure to regulate the limits of Sunday labour, not only in the administrative department, but in factories? Above all, why should it not impose conditions in this respect, in favour of the employed, in connexion with those concessions of charters which it grants to industrial companies?

I do not mean, certainly, to prescribe an order of things impossible in our social condition, nor to deprive populations which are incredulous or indifferent to religion of all outward enjoyment on this day. Such is not my object; for it is not to bind new burdens that I understand the mission of our new society. I limit myself to professing (my idea being taken within just limits) that it is in the interests of social order for the State, without touching the principle of personal liberty, to watch over the lot of all who live upon the daily bread of dependence; and for it to consider those abuses which some men's need of enjoyment, or others' avarice, transforms into a real oppression of one class of citizens by another. Why should not the State—impartial as it ought to be, in my judgment, in the matter of the forms of religion—think itself bound, in the name of morals and the general welfare, to maintain within a limit which I cannot define, but which experience would indicate, the more serious observance of an institution salutary alike to the masses and to individuals? Why should it not put in force the police regulations which exist, and which fall too often into disuse? Why, for example, should it not establish a tribunal of appeal against this kind of oppression, and not, at least, institute inquiries? It has, indeed, a recognised mission as to marriage, and it has based a whole system of legislation upon this institution. Now the Sunday is an institution of the same kind, and dates from the same origin—from the very beginning of humanity. No State, whether it professes liberty of worship or not, can, therefore, in my opinion, remain indifferent to this question, or refuse its sanction to the reform which we ask. It is true that, more or less, its protection is already secured for this day, and that legislation and usage, as well as experiments made since the Revolution of France, have consecrated the distinction of this day; but in our countries—those of the French and Latin languages at least—it has been done in a manner so timid and feeble, that it is with difficulty the intervention makes itself felt; and it seems to tend more and more to become extinct.

It would therefore behove us to attack these great evils, these bad examples which come from lofty regions, and these paralyses of power. After having pointed out the part reserved for individuals in the reform for which we call, I believe it would be proper to take up this question in view of the masses, and to stigmatise the great abuses of which society is culpable in regard to it. I believe that many of the manufacturers would agree with me in this hypothesis. One of them, at least, whom I sought to interest in this cause, and whose operations depend upon the Government and the railway companies, made to me this important confession: "It is from the State, and from the railway companies, that chiefly proceed bad examples and great oppression; and to them the remedy must be first applied."

It will be well to notice this word "first."

It is therefore for the religious societies which have at heart the question which engages us to use their influence there. But how will they succeed if they do not seek to add to the number of their auxiliaries; if in some manner they do not centralise their inquiries; if they do not unite their voices, and do not form a combination which permits them to act occasionally in common? Their union alone might fix attention, subdue illwill, and give the necessary authority for soliciting great companies and Governments to deign to reflect upon the evil in which they are implicated, and to show to them that their interests are at bottom in harmony with the reform which is asked of them.

It would, no doubt, be a noble and grand result if a holy league were formed for the restoration of the holy day. But without yet entering practically upon the idea of such an association, so long as that idea is evidently not matured, in every country at least a central society, formed of aggregations of local branches, might be encouraged, and to them would appertain, until an intervention more central and more powerful could be secured, the preliminary and important care of statistical studies upon this question, which as yet has been so little investigated; to them also would belong the special mission of tentatives towards the upper regions of society. It would be theirs, moreover, to address themselves to the great industrial or municipal corporations and the chambers of representatives.

If this idea of a confederation of local associations could be applied in particular to Switzerland, it would, no doubt, be applicable in larger countries—in England especially, where so great efforts have already been made, with the energy and perseverance by which that nation is characterised, and where there exists, moreover, a society whose action has made itself felt for many years, and from the labours of which we propose to derive much light. What might not be expected from an association on a larger scale, and one to which would appertain a grander mission yet—that of appealing to sovereigns themselves?

But to succeed in this Christian enterprise, let a humble brother of Geneva be permitted to say, and with all the respect he bears to his English brethren—above all, to those who do not know, except imperfectly, our countries—Do not lose sight of the fact that every country has its susceptibilities on this question more than on any other, perhaps; that many prejudices exist in France, in Germany, and, perhaps, among us too; and that there is a sort of dread of what they call a Scotch Sunday, or an English one.

You have preceded us in the way of reforms ; your fidelity, the counsels of your great experience, and your practical directions, have guided us ; your example has been viewed by us with edification, with admiration, and even with humiliation ; but if you desire to succeed in an enterprise of this nature, consider that it must not be entered upon without great precautions ; that before all we must not ignore the imprescriptible rights of Christian liberty ; that we must strive to free the question of prejudices with which it has often been surrounded by a fear of formalism ; in one word, that we must make it more a matter of love than of legality. (Matt. ix. 13, xii. 7.) Men must not be able to say that we come to bind new burdens upon them (Matt. xi. 30, xxiii. 4, compared with Jer. xvii. 21, 22, 24), but to unbind those they bear.

This utterance will be better heard and better understood, for it will be no longer only the trumpet and consuming fire of Sinai, but the gentle voice of Him who has said, "Come unto me ; I will have mercy, and not sacrifice" (Matt. xii. 7) ; and who says to us still, at least in spirit, "This is my day which I have prepared for you from the foundation of the world. Render it to your brethren ; retake it yourselves ; its observance is for the welfare of your body and the salvation of your soul."

SOCIETY FOR THE SANCTIFICATION OF THE LORD'S-DAY.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES.

The Lord Jesus Christ has declared that the Sabbath was made for man.—Mark ii. 27, 28.

By these words He has solemnly confirmed two truths concerning the institution of one day of rest in the week.

The first, that this institution, established of God from the origin of the world, is a gift of His love, and indispensable to man, whether for the body or the soul.

The second, that in the person of Adam God gave it to his posterity, to men of all times, of all places, and of all dispensations.

These words of Jesus Christ, which are only a summary of Gen. ii. 2, 3, evidently involve, as a consequence, the obligation which God also Himself proclaimed upon Sinai, to remember the day of rest, to keep it holy.

But this obligation, like all those which flow from the Gospel, is in nothing Judaical. To keep holy the Lord's-day according to the will of God, Christians ought not to abandon the liberty in which their Saviour has placed them. Nevertheless, it would be to offend God at the peril of the soul, to take this liberty as a pretext for living after the flesh, and to find time, without necessity, for one's ordinary labours on this day ; for if any man keep the Lord's-day, the Lord's-day will keep him ; but the man who does not keep this day to hallow it, very soon has no more than the appearance of piety.

Every man convinced of the truth of these principles, drawn from Holy Scripture, ought to feel himself urged to do three things :—

1. To search his ways, to see if the manner in which he spends the Lord's-day is conformed to the Lord's will.

2. To be a worker with God, so as to labour above all, by his own example, to re-establish all round him respect for this holy day, and specially to secure the fullest possible enjoyment of it to persons who, by their calling, live in dependence upon others.

3. Lastly, to combine with those who share these convictions, upon this fundamental point, to labour in common to spread the knowledge of the privileges and duties attached to the Lord's-day.

THE INCESSANT DISCUSSIONS ON THE ROMAN QUESTION.

A popular German fable relates that a magician once called up a spirit, whose duty was to bring casks of water to his house, and there empty them. Unhappily, however, the sorcerer forgot the formula which was to stop the labours of his servant, so that the wicked demon, continuing to pour out torrents of water, at length drowned the imprudent magician.

Something analogous to this has befallen the French Government in relation to the Roman question. After having declared that Italy should be free, and himself thus raised this question, Napoleon III. is affrighted at his own work. He wants to throw this heavy burden from his shoulders, and recommends patience to the Italians, whilst he advises Pius IX. to grant liberal reforms. Vain efforts! barren labour! The Italians demand, with daily-increasing importunity, their natural capital. Pius IX. obstinately refuses to make the least concession. The Popish bishops of France have recourse to every means of exciting the masses of the people. The liberal press, on its side, incessantly urges that our Government has contracted towards Italy moral and political obligations from which it has no right to escape. It is impossible for the Emperor, notwithstanding the despotic power which he wields, to suppress this controversy: the force of events is stronger than himself. One point alone seems actually cleared up—namely, that all idea of reconciliation between Italy and the Roman See is absolutely chimerical. Their pretensions are too completely opposed. The Pope will never yield, or even consent to share, his temporal authority with Victor Emmanuel. And the Italians, on their part, will never give up their demand for Rome as the foundation and the guarantee of their unity.

At the moment of my writing this, the Marquis de Lavalette has quitted the city of the Vatican, and the principal employés of the French Embassy have followed his example. There remains at Rome only a secretary of the second rank, to regulate the minor affairs of travellers.

THE CLERICAL PRESS IN FRANCE EMBARRASSED BY THE MATAMOROS AFFAIR.

Your readers are aware of the judgment pronounced by the Judicial Courts of Granada, in Spain. The pious Matamoras, and one of his colleagues, have been condemned to long years of imprisonment, and to the loss of all their civil rights. The daily press of Paris has generally pronounced a severe condemnation upon this sentence. Thus the Journal des Débats, the Siècle, the Temps, and others, have plainly declared that whilst Spain retains in her code laws so superannuated and barbarous, she must renounce all idea of being reckoned amongst the Great Powers of Europe.

The journals of the Legitimist party, the Union, and the Gazette de France, and those of the ultra-conservative party, especially the La France of M. de Lagueronniere, have preserved, respecting this affair, a studied silence. They themselves experience regret and shame at the spectacle of legislation which recalls the Inquisition of the Middle Ages.

The clerical press, represented by the Monde, has alone ventured to apologise for the Spanish judges, and its embarrassment is very visible. How, in fact, can acts of such savage intolerance be justified before the French people, who have entirely adopted—if not in practice, at least in theory and in their laws—the principles of religious liberty? There exists, even amongst the most retrogressive priests of our country, a species of shame, which prevents them from openly adopting maxims of persecution which are condemned by the national conscience.

The organs of the Ultramontane faction have timidly, and with much cautiousness of language, affirmed that the judges of Granada have merely administered the Spanish law, which identifies the rights of citizenship with the profession of Roman Catholicism. That is true, reply the liberal journals; we do not hold the magistrates of Granada responsible for their sentence; but the fault must be imputed to the legislation itself. Hasten, then, for the honour of Spain, to abolish these detestable laws! The advocates of the clerical party further urge that the accused were political agitators, disguised under the mantle of religion. Unworthy and odious calumny! reply the men of the liberal press. But religious liberty exists in Spain, exclaim the Ultramontanists, despairing of their cause; for every one is free to believe, or not to believe, in Roman Catholicism; it is only the propagation, or the open expression, of beliefs contrary to the religion of the majority which is prohibited by the laws. Miserable sophism! answer the interpreters of modern ideas. What sort of religious liberty is that which does not permit the avowal of individual convictions, and which punishes with the galleys a pious man, guilty of the crime of having read or distributed the Bible to his fellow-citizens? Do not persist in uttering such false arguments. Spain is dishonoured before the civilised world by the prosecution against Matamoros. In vain will she construct railways; in vain will she open manufactures, and advance in the development of her material interests. The Spanish people must accept and embody in their code the free exercise of worship. If they will not do this, they will be degraded to the lowest rank of European nations.

This controversy will be very useful. We do not hope, it is true, that it will convert the Jesuits or the higher orders of the clergy to the maxims of liberty and equality in matters of religion. But the statesmen and the members of the middle classes in Spain will be more accessible to these principles. They will labour to cleanse their country from the stain with which it is now covered; and the sufferings of our excellent brother Matamoros will become, under the blessing of God, a means of elevation and of progress for his native land. Religious liberty must make the tour of the whole world.

CONTROVERSY RELATIVE TO THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE FOUR GOSPELS.

The name of M. Renan reappears often enough in our correspondence, and the circumstance is no way surprising; for this writer is the chief of that French philosophical school which rejects everything that is supernatural in the Christian revelation. M. Renan loves to descant upon religious questions; he possesses much learning, the art of imparting interest to the most abstract subjects, a rare talent of style, and a constant moderation of language, even when he essays to overthrow the foundations of the faith. These qualities explain how he has acquired, amongst the cultivated men of our country, an influence so extensive. Well! M. Renan has recently published, in the Journal des Débats, some objections against the authenticity of the Gospels, whilst reviewing a work of the rationalist Pastor Réville upon the Gospel of St. Matthew. He pretends that this Gospel is a work of imperfect compilation, put together about the year 80 or 90 of the Christian era, and containing first the sayings of Jesus, collected by Matthew himself; next, anecdotes dictated by Peter to Mark; and lastly, legendary traditions of the converted Jews. St. Matthew, according to MM. Renan and Réville, brought together the discourses of Christ without the facts, and Mark has related the facts without the discourses. Subsequent writers have arranged and completed the first of these compositions by the aid of the second. As to St. Luke, M. Renan affirms that his testimony merits little confidence. "It serves," says this philosopher, "as a means of transition from the authentic to the apocryphal Gospels; the historical value of his work is, in general, very weak." But it is especially the fourth Gospel—the Gospel of St. John—which is regarded by M. Renan as a perpetual subject of doubts and contradictions. He declares that the Christ of St. John is altogether different from the Christ of the other three evangelists, and that we have two Jesuses, as we have two Socrates, the Socrates of Plato, and that of Xenophon. How are we to reconcile the Jesus of St. Matthew with that of St. John? "This," says our author in conclusion, "is the grand problem which the latter half of our century will have to examine under all its phases."

I have referred to this controversy in order to acquaint your readers, first, with the extent to which the rationalistic school carries its negations; next, with the partiality of certain political journals for anti-Christian opinions. For the Journal des Débats has complacently opened its columns to the article of M. Renan. But when another learned writer, M. Wallon, also a member of the National Institute, forwarded a reply to the assertions of his colleague, the same Journal des Débats refused to insert it. Thus is it permitted in some of our most accredited journals to attack the authenticity of the Gospels, but not to prove that authenticity! Scepticism is free to raise its voice in a great portion of our daily press, but piety is not free to combat scepticism! Is not this a new and melancholy proof that irreligion is dominant in France?

Certainly we find, in these facts, a powerful motive for labouring, as much as possible, by our prayers, by our pecuniary sacrifices, by the circulation of the Scriptures, by preaching, &c., to make the truth of the Gospel better known; and I rejoice to be able to give you, in the sequel of this letter, some details which attest that the friends of the Gospel, whether in our Reformed National Church, or in our Free Churches, are putting forth an activity already fruitful.

NEW PROTESTANT CHURCHES IN THE PYRENEES, ETC.

Let us begin with the Protestant churches which have recently been built and opened in the Pyrenees. The pastor of this district is M. Emilien Frossard, well known for his evangelical convictions and his indefatigable zeal. The central point of his labours is at Bagnères de Bigorre, near to Pau. This is a bathing-place, frequented, in the summer season, by a great number of persons, particularly by the English. M. Frossard has found excellent friends and generous auxiliaries amongst these Protestants of the United Kingdom. With their aid, and that of some French Protestants, he has already succeeded in erecting churches at Bagnères de Bigorre and at Tarbes. Quite recently, he has had the pleasure of opening a third church at Cauterets, which is yearly a place of great resort for bathers of every nation.

At Vesoul, in the department of La Meurthe, a new Protestant church has also been erected. The priests are greatly irritated at this, and one of them has published a pamphlet, in which he dares to say that the opening of this building, designed for the worship of heretics, will be a school of immorality. These libels have excited the indignation and the disgust of the public. How can the advocates of Popery forget that the principle of religious liberty has taken deep root in our country?

LABOURS OF DIFFERENT EVANGELICAL SOCIETIES.

I have before me several publications which prove that the preaching of the Gospel is continued in France with ardour and success. Thus, for example, the last Report of the Evangelical Society of Geneva informs us that it has established thirty-one preaching stations in our departments, which are supplied by twelve pastors, eight evangelists, fourteen schoolmasters, seven schoolmistresses, &c. These agents of the Geneva Society have founded flourishing congregations at Macon, Chalon, Tournus, Sornay, Royan, and other places. The pious men of the Genevese republic are always disposed to make generous sacrifices for our country; they remember that France has given to them Calvin and Theodore Beza, the great Reformers of French Switzerland; and they are well disposed to discharge the noble debt contracted by their ancestors.

The Evangelical Society of the North of France has recently celebrated its twentieth anniversary at Lisle. Its labours have produced satisfactory results. More than thirty places of worship have been opened by the society in six departments, which contain a population of three millions of souls; and about three thousand persons, the majority of whom are converted Romanists, constantly attend on the services held in these churches. Painful difficulties have often delayed the opening of churches and of schools. Pastors and schoolmasters were for a long time compelled to go from house to house, to instruct the converts separately. But the patience and constancy of these servants of Christ have surmounted all obstacles. Generally speaking, the new converts do honour to their faith by their conduct. Thus, in the industrial crisis which is desolating the North of France, the proselytes supply an example of manly resignation. "They are afflicted," writes an evangelist, "but not cast down; they bear their trials with much courage; they understand that in keeping near their Saviour they will find true consolation. . . ."

SYNOD OF THE UNION OF FREE CHURCHES AT LAFORCE.

The little village of Laforce, in the department of La Dordogne, so well known by the charitable institutions of Pastor John Bost, was, last month, the scene of unusual animation. Numerous pastors and elders from other places were assembled there, and experienced on the part of the inhabitants the most cordial reception. It was the Synod of the Union of the Free Churches of France. I need not remind your readers that since 1848 several Independent congregations have constituted an association, which has revived the synodal assemblies of ancient times. This union comprises about thirty congregations, scattered over the entire surface of the French territory. The synod was presided over by the Rev. Frederic Monod, Independent minister, of Paris. The reports were of an interesting and encouraging character. In some of the congregations the number of communicants has greatly increased. Delegates from foreign churches were present; amongst others, four from Scotland, the Revs. John Smart, James Taylor, Julius Wood, and John Bonar.

FRENCH PROTESTANT MISSIONS.

French Protestantism, too, engages more and more in the vast field of missions. It has founded, as you know, numerous stations in the South of Africa. The Bassutos, the Bechuanas, and other savage tribes, have received with joy from the lips of our missionaries the good news of salvation. Some of our brethren are also stationed in China. Our attention has now been turned to the coast of Senegal, and M. Jacques, a student of the Missionary Institution of Paris, is on the eve of departing for this new sphere of labour. The French commandant of the colony of Senegal is not only a Protestant, but a very pious man. It is he who has taken the initiative in this enterprise. He will protect the young missionary from the violence of the natives, and be the means of opening to him a wide door for the preaching of the Gospel. May the Lord bless the evangelisation of Senegal! We have great and holy duties to fulfil towards the Africans. X. X. X.

SPAIN.

FINAL SENTENCE UPON THE SPANISH PROTESTANTS: LETTER FROM M. MATAMOROS.

Since the letter which we give below—addressed by Matamoros to Mr. Greene—was written, intelligence has been received of the confirmation of the inhuman sentence upon Matamoros and Alhama. For further details, we refer to the report of the proceedings of the Evangelical Alliance on Wednesday, Oct. 15, which will be found in our other columns:—

M. MATAMOROS TO MR. GREENE.

Granada, Prison of the Audiencia,
Oct. 5, 1862.

My dear and zealous Brother in Him who is our Life, and our Faith, and our Hope,—Two years ago the Governor of Granada sent the order for my capture, and for the examination of my house. I was seized, was taken to a miserable prison, and from that time until now you know what a chain of suffering has bound me; you know how much honour has been put upon me; for it is a glory and a joy to be permitted to suffer for Jesus' sake. Well, now my enemies, not yet satisfied, have condemned me to suffer eight years of the galleys, to inhabitation, and to the judgment of all the costs.

I am twenty-seven, and I am going to the galleys; to a horrible place, which is intended for the shame and sorrow of those who dwell there. But there is neither shame nor sorrow for me! My soul rejoices in Jesus. I, a poor miserable sinner, have been chosen by the Lord to suffer; and in this there is no shame, but honour; wonderful honour for me; for I do not deserve this distinction, and I am very grateful to my Master who has granted it to me.

This horrible suit has at length come to an end, having been carried forward with a most tyrannical spirit for two years—two years of grief, and tribulation, and tears—two years of the patient resignation of a dear mother, whose son has been torn from her side, and placed under the ban of a terrible sentence. Oh, my poor mother! She was attacked with illness when she received the news. Mother, thou art also a victim to this cruelty, but thou also canst rejoice in thy tribulation for Christ.

The time has come, dear friend, when I, deprived by men of all rights of citizenship, must enter upon my punishment—must go to the place which society has set apart for those wretches who are unworthy to continue in its midst. The voice of my dearly-loved mother will, perhaps, never again reach my ears. I shall know that she suffers, but shall not be able to comfort her with my presence. I shall be there altogether at the mercy of a fanatical governor, who will visit me with all the force of Popish cruelty. There, at the merest caprice of the officials, the unfortunate convicts are beaten, and buffeted, and abused; even when inoffensive; and I shall be exposed, perhaps, to the cruel blows of some vile criminal, who has been chosen as overseer, chiefly because his terrible antecedents are such as to inspire his fellow-prisoners with terror.

The blows of such an one may fall upon me, and hasten my death. I shall never hear the voice of my dear brothers. Your precious letters, my much-loved friend, will never reach me; and this will be my life for eight long years. But for all this, my cross I take up joyfully, and follow Jesus. If I have not been permitted to carry the Word of God from village to village throughout Spain, I will publish it in prison. God rejoices over the conversion of the most abject, of the most sinful; and to those criminals I will show the way of life. There I will be, if the Lord allows me, just what I was when free. My hearers will not be honourable citizens, they will be miserable convicts. But perhaps these very convicts may see how horrible their past life has been, and will begin to live a new one, and will respect and will follow Jesus; and you can fancy how I rejoice to be able to dedicate myself to such a glorious work; and I must not fear the rod of punishment. Jesus sought out His death for our sakes.

His Apostles went everywhere preaching the Word, through sorrow, tribulations, torments; they are my example; I follow them. And all this is not in my own strength—I am worthless—I am nothing—I can do nothing—by God's strength only I shall be enabled to do this; yet my heart tells me that I shall be permitted to carry out my earnest desires, as I have prayed for the sake of Jesus.

Alhama has been sentenced to nine years. The additional year of punishment is given (amongst other reasons) because he wrote and acknowledged that letter, directed to me, which was seized, and which, bearing my name and address in full, and containing important intelligence, was the cause of my imprisonment also in Barcelona; which you remember was commanded by telegram. The judges believed that Granada was the chief seat and origin of these troubles, of which they suppose me to be a victim. Notwithstanding, they condemned me to eight years. The Lord pardon them.

Trigo has been pronounced not guilty, and will soon be set free. He will return to the bosom of his family. I do heartily rejoice. Dear Trigo; may the Lord enlighten and protect him for the future.

As our sentences do not exactly correspond with those of the inferior tribunal, we may again appeal against them. It is a matter of indifference to me whether an appeal is made, or whether I go at once to my doom. The appeal would keep us still for some months in this prison; but this offers nothing to be wished for, as the immediate commencement of my term of labour has no terrors.

I have, however, consulted my respected and revered friends W. N. and D. B. and yourself. I will do as you advise, but have no choice in the matter myself. Alhama will appeal, but I need not therefore. I will fulfil my eight years, and he may obtain commutation. Believe me, dear friend, I am very happy. The continued illness of my poor darling mother is my only real trouble; but my Lord gives me strength to bear all with patience.

I shall address a letter to the Queen on her arrival at Granada; not to ask for mercy, which I do not need from her. No, for my crime, if it existed, would only be judged by the God who judges the consciences of men, but I will represent to her our inoffensive lives, the liberty of our brothers in Seville, Malaga, and Granada, and the inalienable right of Christians to meet together to worship round the household hearth.

I forgot to tell you that all the rest of the prisoners have been or will immediately be set at liberty. My most loving remembrances to all dear to you. Salute all my brothers in my name.—Your affectionate brother in the Lord,
MANUEL MATAMOROS.

ITALY.

Florence, Oct. 20, 1862.

EVANGELISATION IN LOMBARDY.

A rapid survey of the field north of the Apennines will bring out some new facts and features in the work of evangelisation. The Venetian territory is subjected to a system of espionage so close as to prevent any successful operations. An attempt was lately made in connexion with the circulation of the Scriptures, but failed. The priests—a majority of whom are known to be liberal—have been forced, through Roman and Austrian oppression, to sign addresses to the Pope in favour of the persistent maintenance of the temporal power. A few have courageously resisted, at the risk of degradation from the priesthood and removal from their offices.

The priests of Lombardy are now, as they have ever been, liberal. The Ambrosian rights, like the Gallican in France, have conserved their independence. This has endeared them to the people. Only the other day a parish priest was interred amid the greatest respect and sorrow on the part of a large portion of the Milanese shopkeepers; for he was known as a good man and a kind priest. Monsignore Caccia, the spiritual ruler of the metropolitan diocese of Lombardy, occupies the first place among reactionaries and Papal bigots. He refuses to give his sanction to several appointments made legally by the Government, promotes a priest to office who has just finished a well-merited imprisonment, leaves four canon stalls vacant in Milan Cathedral year after year, forces a liberal priest to withdraw from the Clerical Liberal Association, under pain of forfeiting his parochial funds, and in every way, as far as his episcopal influence can reach, thwarts the civil authority and hinders the cause of Italy. The mass of the clergy, however, sympathise with Victor Emmanuel, as is shown by the bold action of their Liberal Association, in defending their own liberties and the project for the unity of Italy. From among them a large number of signatures has been obtained to the petition of Passaglia, desiring the Pope to let go his temporal power.

A more important document than this, with its 12,000 priestly names adhibited, there is not anywhere to be found. Every fair and unfair means has been publicly and privately put in force against individuals and clerical corporations to diminish its growing weight; but in vain, for in that list there seventy-six vicars capitular, 1,074 monsignori, cathedral canons, &c., 774 archpriests, provosts, &c., 341 theologians, doctors in divinity, and professors; while the remainder is composed of the most intelligent and respected men in the secular clergy of the country. Even now that the list is closed, additional signatures are still coming in.

In Milan a greater number of people hear the Gospel preached than in any other town of Italy. Among the operative classes there is a strong disposition to hear the truth, and three able evangelists labour successfully in this quarter. Lagomarsino, late of Genoa, and Tealdo, late of Bologna, preach alternately, not only on the Sabbath, but on every week-day, in two large halls, containing 450 and 250 people respectively. They are both working men, with no special preparation for the ministry, but naturally gifted with eloquence, and well acquainted with Christian truth, and are supported by the Geneva Society. The meetings are always crowded to the door. Elsewhere evangelistic services are very unpunctually attended, but here the worship begins with the striking of the clock, the hearers desirous of obtaining a seat being in their places for five or ten minutes previously. The most gratifying circumstance to an onlooker is that there is no controversy, and no preaching from mere texts on the part of the evangelists, but the setting forth of Christ and a constant expounding of the Word of God at their reunions. The hearers bring their Bibles to church, and search for the passages referred to in a most intelligent way, and a good sale is made at the stalls for Bibles and religious books at the doors of the chapels. This is very different from what I saw in the Waldensian Valleys last summer, at Pomaret parish church, where, though the people have the Bible in their homes, it is not the custom to bring them to church; so that not a dozen hearers in a large congregation of 250 persons could refer to the text under exposition. The sooner such a custom is changed the better.

While the Free Italian Church under Lagomarsino and Tealdo contains about 250 members, who are carefully admitted on the recommendation of two Christian brethren, and after conference with the pastor, the church of the Waldensian evangelist, Mr. Turin, is also well attended by a steady congregation. The pulpit ministrations are very able, and highly appreciated, and a solid work is going forward, which now includes Sabbath-schools and day-schools, and the superintendence of the Elberfeld Society Colportage. Both Mr. Williams, of the Episcopal Church, and Mr. Piggott, of the Wesleyan Society, are resident in Milan, and aid the movement with their counsels, sympathies, and prayers.

The humble lay evangelist of the Waldensian Church at Brescia, Mr. Pugno, continues to have success in his work. One or two cases have lately occurred of bigotry in refusing the common cemetery to the evangelical dead. As this is now happily contrary to the law of the land, we hope such a representation will be made to the authorities as effectually to prevent the repetition of similar outrages.

PARMA, MODENA, &c.

At Intra, on Lago Maggiore, the Wesleyans have opened an evening school and a book shop, in connexion with the colportage carried on in the neighbourhood. At Parma the young Wesleyan evangelist, Belmondo, has been exceedingly well received by the people. The old Roman Catholic church in which the service is conducted has, during the summer, contained 200 regular hearers. The school and dépôt are doing well. The newspapers defend the movement, and everywhere—in the public streets and gardens—the evangelist is courteously saluted, and kindly received in private houses. An old priest, who lived opposite the chapel, could not bear the sight, so grievous to him, and the passage of Scripture, "The truth shall make you free," above the door, and has changed his quarters in consequence.

Nothing could be more encouraging than the commencement of this new station. Mr. Salamon, the Waldensian pastor, carries on a regular service in Modena, and on alternate Sabbaths preaches in Reggio and Bologna. He has good congregations in these three towns, and is strongly supported by the Swiss communities resident in these parts.

MISSION TO THE JEWS AT MODENA.

I am happy to mention the arrival of a fourth Italian missionary to the Jews—viz., the Rev. Richard Cotter, of Modena. He and Mr. Laurin, of Turin, are supported by Episcopal Jewish societies; Mr. Meyer, of Leghorn, by the London Jewish Society; and the Rev. Theodore Meyer, of Ancona, by the Jewish Committee of the Free Church of Scotland. There has been such a favourable opening among the Jews recently, that these brethren have already their hands full of work. Mr. Cotter, who is a largehearted and devoted Christian man, has been studying the language for five or six months, and going out and in among the 2,000 Jews of Modena, many of whom are wealthy, and all of whom have formed his acquaintance, visit his house, and enter into unprejudiced discussion. This is greatly owing to Mr. Cotter's conciliatory manner. He has come through some trying experience while a missionary to the Roman Catholics in Ireland, among whom he was allowed to stay, and kindly treated, while other missionaries were stoned and driven away rudely from his sphere of work. Not only the town, but the neighbourhood of Modena, contains many Jews, to whom Mr. Cotter proposes immediately to carry the glad tidings of Christ crucified.

URBINO, BOLOGNA, AND ADJACENT PROVINCES.

Giannini, a humble Christian evangelist in the Marches, has suffered violent persecution at Pesaro, but continues both there and at Fano, eight miles distant, to have encouraging meetings with the brethren. At Bologna there is also an evangelist, Pompei Rossi, supported by Count Guicciardini. He is an able preacher—an ex-priest—and gathers round him 150 hearers. He has great difficulty in finding a locale at this moment; in fact, the meetings had to be temporarily suspended, as he was driven out of the Bentivoglio Palace, where the services were held, as soon as the family, many of whose members are in Papal pay, heard that the Gospel was being preached within their ancestral halls.

As yet nothing has been done for Bergamo, Lodi, Piacenza, Pavia, and Ferrara, in which towns there are, from our private information, a number of believers in Christ, and readers of the Bible in secret. In fact, the colporteur has been the avant courier of the evangelist, and now the great want is labourers to enter into the harvest. I trust soon to report the appointment of good men to these important places. There is no doubt that the large towns for the present should be attended to. In the smaller places, where the populations are more bigoted, or dependent on the Church, the priests have a thwarting power which slips from their hands in the larger centres of population and influence.

EDUCATIONAL MOVEMENT.

Beyond the Apennines a great school movement on the part of the Government has been for some time in progress. Without troubling you with detailed statistics, let me say that the number of day-schools has increased during the last two years in Lombardy, Emilia, and the Marches by the hundred; while numberless Sabbath-schools and evening schools, new things in Italy, have been established in the same districts. The new Minister of Education is indefatigable in issuing circulars to prefects and communities for the commencement or reorganization of every branch of work in the educational department. Intent upon introducing the normal system of our own country, he lately appointed an English Protestant lady, Mrs. Burbidge, who had done good service at Bologna, to teach history and geography in Lucca. A great excitement ensued, so that the Prefect of the town could not guarantee order, and the mayor actually threatened to resign unless the obnoxious appointment was cancelled. The liberal newspapers have all defended Mrs. Burbidge, and spoken not very complimentarily of the Lucchese; while the Minister of Instruction has stood firm, and assured the parties concerned that they must either have the lady he has named, or no teacher at all of these branches.

SCIENTIFIC CONGRESS.

Another evidence of the zeal of Government and all thinking men, in relieving the country of the incubus of ignorance fostered by the priests, is found in the proceedings of the Tenth Congress of Scientific and Literary Italians (corresponding to our own British Association), which has met lately at Sienna, and appointed its next meeting, by acclamation, to be held in free Rome. The questions of civil marriage and the unification of dialects into one Italian language were followed by lengthened and practical deliberations on the preparation of suitable school-books for regimental schools, evening schools, and the other classes in various institutions. All these are needed, and more. Only a few days ago the letter, said to have been written by the mother of our Saviour from Jerusalem to the inhabitants of Messina, was printed, for the comfort of the Sicilians, to show them how closely all their interests were guarded by their Divine patron, the Virgin Mary.

NEW EVANGELICAL PERIODICAL.

The Provvidenza del Popolo, of Bologna, has been at last discontinued, owing to the vexatious sequestrations to which it was subjected, and the evangelical editor is before the tribunal charged with language offensive to the religion of the State. At the same time Naples sends us the early numbers of a new evangelical periodical, La Civiltà Evangelica, edited with much ability, and arranged to suit the popular taste, by Signor Perez, the ex-Jesuit, who has been for some time evangelising in the South. The news of the work that is going on in all quarters is given in an unsectarian spirit. The preaching of Signor Appia and Mazzarella is equally praised; the evangelical schools and depôts of the various parties are highly spoken of; and we are assured that, as in the North, so in the Southern provinces, there are many towns from which the demand for an evangelist is very urgent. The journal is a very agreeable melange of theological, controversial, practical, and anecdotal matter; and will, we trust, meet with a large circulation.

THE WALDENSIAN CHURCH.

The examinations at the Waldensian College, postponed on account of Signor Revel's absence in England, have just closed with great credit to the students and their professors. It is with no ordinary feelings of gratitude to God that we see such able and well-furnished men about to enter into the ministry in Italy. Year after year their numbers will increase and their influence tell with greater effect. The "Corps des Pasteurs" will shortly meet, and on the ground of these satisfactory examinations, license three or four of the young men. Signor Marchand will be settled in Elba, taking the oversight of the three stations of Rio, Longone, and Portoferrario, which are within six miles of each other, aided, probably, by some lay agency. Signor Prochet goes to Lucca, Signor Peccennini to Naples, to labour along with Mr. Appia; while Mr. Ehni remains in Florence as co-pastor with Professor Geymonat.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, Oct. 15, 1862.

THE KIRCHENTAG AT BRANDENBURG.

The great meeting of the Kirchentag, which took place at Brandenburg, on the 23rd September, was of so animated and practical a character as to call for a few moments of our attention. Although the Kirchentag is simply a fraternal reunion, without official authority, the collective opinion of so many men distinguished for learning and for piety, upon a question actually exciting the whole of Germany, must always be of great importance. This question, the first which was debated, was that of the reconstitution of our National Churches. This is the only topic of debate respecting which I purpose to communicate some salient features of the discussions.

The assembly was presided over by the venerable Dr. Nitzsch, of Berlin, one of the most profound theologians and finest Christian characters of our epoch. After a fervent prayer, pronounced by the Superintendent-General, Dr. Hofmann, of Berlin (whom a recent and painful bereavement did not prevent from taking part in the meeting), the President opened the first sitting by an address, in which he gave a sketch of the labours of the central committee since the last assembly at Barmen. He then handed in two letters, written by two eminent men, both of whom, on previous occasions, had presided over the Kirchentag—viz., M. von Bethmann-Holweg, one of its founders, and M. von Mühler, the present Minister of Worship in Prussia. Both evinced a religious interest respecting the deliberations of the assembly. The first, in particular, expressed his wish that, during the whole session, the love of the Saviour, which alone can overcome the world, might burn in the hearts of all the speakers. The President then reminded those present that the Kirchentag had been represented the preceding year in the assembly of the Evangelical Alliance at Geneva, and that that assembly had responded by the expression of its most fraternal sympathies. He stated, lastly, that the committee appointed by the last Kirchentag to collect funds on behalf of the Christians of Syria had obtained abundant aid, and that a sum remained in hand, on the disposal of which the assembly would have to decide.

But to come to the subject of the first day's debate, to which I wish specially to refer—the question, according to the programme, was laid down in these terms: What are the fundamental principles of an ecclesiastical constitution which shall combine the consistorial and synodal systems? To comprehend the importance and practical bearing of this question, we must recollect that, in almost all the countries of Germany, the National Church is governed, almost exclusively, by a consistorium, of which all the members are nominated by the Prince, who is himself the supreme bishop of the Church. This system, a thoroughly-organised Cæsaro-Papism, which has no foundation either in Scripture or in the nature of the Christian Church—which leaves that Church in total inaction, and inevitably destroys its interest and arrests its development—this system is now universally condemned, except only by the spirit of clericalism, which profits by it. It is against this system that those ecclesiastical revolutions to which I have sometimes referred have been directed.

On the other hand, it is thought that Germany is scarcely ripe for the adoption of the Presbyterian, or synodal system, which prevails in several of the great Reformed Churches. Moreover, the principle of the union of Church and State is too closely interwoven with its habits to allow the thought of creating an ecclesiastical government which should rest entirely in the hands of the people. Germany seeks, therefore, to combine the two systems, in such sort as to find in the consistories an element at once permanent, conservative, and administrative, whilst the people of the Church may be represented by synodal assemblies.

According to the usages of the Kirchentag, the discussion on this subject was opened by Dr. Herrmann, of Gottingen, in an elaborate and finished essay, the reading of which was listened to with intense interest, although it occupied nearly an hour and a-half. Under the existing circumstances of Germany—in presence of a popular movement, which threatens to supersede the old institutions by a system of national representation, both in State and Church—in presence, too, of the strong opposition made to this movement by clericalism and absolutism—in presence of the profound troubles occasioned by this conflict—we may regard as a genuine triumph of liberal ideas this essay of the learned professor, who openly acknowledged the insufficiency of the consistorial system, and the necessity of calling all the vital forces of the Church into action, by the creation of synods. At the same time, his treatise on this question was marked by an advocacy of well-considered combinations, by means of which he sought to harmonise the two elements, which might so easily be found in separation, if not in conflict. And, which was still more cheering, all who spoke after him treated the question in the same sense, imparting to it new light, and discussing it with convictions not less lively.

For ourselves, who firmly believe that the Christian Church, to occupy its proper normal condition, must obtain a perfectly independent existence in relation to the State, these principles of an ecclesiastical constitution do not suffice. Nevertheless, we hail their triumph, because we find in it evidences of great progress—a progress, moreover, not only in ideas, but which we see realised daily in actual facts. In this point of view, we recommend those of our readers who desire to understand the religious condition of Germany to procure for themselves the report of the debates of the Kirchentag at Brandenburg, which will shortly be published.

Amongst the other results of this assembly (to which I shall perhaps revert in a future letter) is one which I mention here with regret. A party amongst the Prussian members of the assembly thought themselves called upon to sign an address to the King of Prussia, in which the public will certainly see approbation of the line of conduct which he has pursued in relation to his Parliament, and condemnation of the measures adopted by the Chamber of Deputies of Berlin. The address, it is true, does not distinctly express this sentiment, nor was it discussed in the assembly; we may, therefore, consider it as the expression of the views only of certain individuals. Nevertheless, it appears to us to be an act of great imprudence. Your readers will understand this conclusion without further explanation of its grounds.

THE RELIGIOUS AGITATION IN HANOVER.

The agitation occasioned in the kingdom of Hanover, by the question of the catechism imposed upon the people by a Royal ordinance, is far from being yet appeased. I stated in my last letter that in presence of the émeute, and under the pressure of numerous petitions, the King had, by a second ordinance, left the adoption or rejection of the new catechism to the parishes. I then expressed an apprehension, generally felt, that this half measure would only transfer the struggle to other ground, by making it a question between the clergy and the people. This has been the case, and has occasioned vexatious conflicts in several communes. Whilst, in some localities, the magistrate prohibits the catechism, the Consistory of Osnabrück has constituted itself a court, has compelled the parents of children who do not bring the new catechism to the schools to appear at its bar, and has imposed on them different fines. This blind clerical despotism will certainly do more harm to religion than all the unbelief which is manifested by the opposition. To impose a belief by compulsion is to deny conscience, is an act of immorality. Dr. Beyschlag, professor of theology in the University of Halle, found an echo in the whole assembly of the Kirchentag, when he exclaimed, "It is not now possible to decree catechisms, and we cannot deny the rights of those who oppose them." A warm controversy on this subject is still pursued in the journals and by means of pamphlets. Two learned professors of the University of Gottingen (Hanover) have taken part in it, in words of wisdom which have scarcely been listened to. They were nevertheless imperatively called for. In fact, the faculty of theology of this university had been consulted respecting the catechism before its publication, and had stated its opinion, in which, whilst approving the general contents of the book, it had also given counsels which were not followed. Public clamour has thus been directed against the university as well as the consistory. And it is to clear themselves from responsibility that two professors, Dr. Dorner, and Dr. Ehrenfeuchter, have spoken, the one in the Neue Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, the other in a separate pamphlet. Dr. Dorner declares that he had expressly counselled that the book should not be imposed on the people by authority, but introduced through the medium of a synod. As to the doctrines of the catechism, in which, generally, he recognises evangelical truth, he has not the less clearly pronounced against baptismal regeneration, against the exaggeration of the power of the priest (the power of the keys), and various other errors contained in this book, the old remains of Catholicism, including even teaching the children to make the sign of the cross. The faculty of theology of Gottingen had asked that all those parts of the catechism should be revised and corrected. If, therefore, the spirit of clericalism be manifested in it, the university is not responsible. Nevertheless, it bears, in spite of itself, a share of the unpopularity with which the public overwhelms the authors of the catechism, and would do so, were it only that it has given the degree of doctor in theology to those Hanoverian pastors who took most direct part in its composition.

The inevitable and happy result of this agitation will be that Hanover will be one of the first States compelled to apply to its Church the principles which have triumphed in the Kirchentag of Brandenburg; and when this Church shall have a synod, with the right of expressing the wishes of the people, and of reducing them to practical decisions, that people will no longer need to resort to an émeute in order to reject doctrines which are repugnant to their consciences. It may probably happen that Rationalism will then obtain some triumphs, but the Gospel also will be enabled to develop all its Divine power in the possession of liberty. To doubt the inherent all-sufficiency of that power is the real infidelity.

Evangelical Alliance.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE BRITISH ORGANIZATION.

TUESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 14.

SOIREE.

The Sixteenth Annual Conference of the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance assembled on Tuesday, October 14. The council met in the morning for the usual business preparatory to the Conference. In the evening there was a soirée and public meeting at the Freemasons' Hall, under the presidency of the Hon. Arthur Kinnaird, M.P. There was a very good attendance. The names of some of those present will be found at the end of our report.

After having partaken of refreshments in an adjoining room, the company assembled in the large hall. The Rev. W. Cardall then gave out the hymn commencing—

"Happy the heart where graces reign,
Where love inspires the breast,"

After which the Rev. Dr. Robson read Eph. iv. 1—16, and the Rev. Dr. Fry offered prayer.

The Chairman then opened the proceedings by giving a cordial welcome to the brethren who had come from different parts to be present at the Conference. He congratulated the meeting on the success which had attended the operations of the Alliance, and on the good it had accomplished. He was glad to see present several foreign brethren. (Cheers.) None who were present at the Conference at Geneva last year could fail to remember the warm and cordial reception they received. He was happy to say that the president of that Conference, M. Naville, was present.

The Rev. W. Urwick, D.D., of Dublin, said he begged to tender his most hearty thanks to the chairman and committee for the cordial welcome which they had just heard. He felt a pleasure which he could hardly express at being present once more at an Annual Conference of the Evangelical Alliance, held at Freemasons' Hall. That spot was, if he might use the term, holy ground, for there, sixteen years ago, the presence of the Holy Spirit was felt and enjoyed at the formation of the Evangelical Alliance. (Cheers.) Never, while memory lasted, would the scene at that aggregate gathering fade from his mind. They had now had the experience of sixteen years, and he thought that a review of what had been effected by the Alliance since then was a proof that their faith had not been in vain. In conclusion, he joined with the chairman in cordially welcoming the foreign visitors, and in expressing his earnest hopes that the health of their president would soon be restored.

The Rev. G. Smith, Secretary of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, said that no body of Christian people were more thoroughly and heartily one with the Evangelical Alliance than the congregational churches of Great Britain and Ireland. Some of them, perhaps, had formed large expectations of what might be done by the Alliance, which had not altogether been fulfilled; and yet in looking back no one could doubt that a large amount of good had been effected. The society had brought Christian people nearer together than they otherwise could have been, and it had also been the means of making English Christians better acquainted with their Continental brethren. It had also led to the cultivation of a spirit of prayer, and had called forth much united effort. He remembered the time when Churchmen and Dissenters rarely united in public, except upon the platforms of the Bible Society, of the Tract Society, and of the City Mission. Since the Alliance had been formed how many and various were the objects in which their efforts and prayers blended together! They felt that the points on which they were agreed were more important than those on which they differed. He might mention the movement for preaching in theatres as an indication of the growing union between Christians of different denominations. During the present year they had had their principles tried in the Bicentenary controversy; not that that controversy in itself was an unmixed evil, for the Apostolic days, and the days of the Reformation, and of the establishment of religious liberty in our own island, were days of controversy. But, unhappily, controversy between Christian people had a tendency to create bitterness, though he was happy to say that he did not think a great deal had been said, during the disputes on either side, which was incompatible with love to Christ, and love to each other as brethren. He would say, let them not only contend for truth, but for charity, carrying out not merely at their annual gatherings, but at home, the spirit enjoined in Dr. Watts's lines:—

"I'll not willingly offend,
Nor be easily offended;
What is wrong I'll try to mend,
And endure what can't be mended."

M. Adrien Naville responded on behalf of the committee of the Evangelical Alliance in Geneva. Too many thanks had, he observed, been given to the friends at Geneva. The thanks of those friends were especially due, and he begged on behalf of the committee to tender them to the British Organization, for the kind help they had given to the executive committee of Geneva, especially during the conferences of last year. That conference had been very useful in promoting evangelisation in Switzerland. New committees were formed in the very week in which they were held for objects connected with the spiritual welfare of the city and canton. Weekly meetings had been held during the whole winter, and many persons had sought interviews with the pastors or godly laymen, to receive instruction in the Word of God and in things necessary for their salvation. When the weather permitted, open-air services had been held, and he was happy to say that Mr. Reginald Radcliffe had spent several months there, and had frequently preached with great success. Other committees had been formed, especially one for the observance of the Sabbath, which would form the subject of a distinct paper during the present Conference. The general results of the Swiss Conference had been most satisfactory, especially its influence on the French character. Many were astonished to find that an Alliance had been formed on a doctrinal dogmatic basis, and great inquiries had been made into the objects and mode of working of such an association. The result was that friends of evangelical truth looked hopefully upon the movement, though they did not all join it. The Geneva committee, amongst other things, had sent a respectful message to the Emperor of Russia in favour of the abolition of slavery in his dominions, and on the promotion of Bible circulation, and he was happy to say that they had received a reply through the Russian Ambassador. The following is a translation:—

"Sir,—It is through you that the Evangelical Alliance of Geneva has presented an address to his Imperial Majesty, my august master, expressing its regrets on the occasion of the disasters which had befallen the city of St. Petersburg in the course of the past summer, as well as its wishes for the success of the important reforms undertaken by his Imperial Majesty. The Emperor has been deeply touched by the sentiments which inspired the Evangelical Alliance. His Imperial Majesty can only appreciate the piety which causes this religious society to implore the blessing of God upon all the nations, and especially upon the sovereigns to whom their destinies are committed. My august master charges me particularly to express to you his thanks, and to beg you to transmit them to the Evangelical Alliance of Geneva, with the assurance of the sentiments of esteem which an association animated by a spirit so conformable to the ends of its institution has inspired in his Imperial Majesty. I rejoice, with especial satisfaction, to obey in this my august orders, at the same time wishing you to accept the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

"The Envoy of Russia,
"AL. OZEROFF."

He could not conclude without expressing his cordial thanks for the very precious memorial forwarded to him as president of the Geneva Conference by the English visitors to Geneva, in the shape of a beautiful edition of "Bagster's Polyglot Bible." He was deeply touched by that mark of kindness. (Applause.)

The Rev. C. Hebert said that the allusion to the formation of the Alliance brought to his recollection a scene that took place in that hall several years ago. Dr. Ryder, Bishop of Gloucester, and afterwards of Lichfield and Coventry, whose memory was loved by all who knew him, came into the meeting, and breathed forth such words of affection and humility, that Mr. Lewis Way stood forward and said that he held in his hand a pamphlet which he had prepared in answer to an attack on the British and Foreign Bible Society, but that since the address to which he had just listened he could not suffer it to be published, and thereupon he tore it to pieces; a remarkable illustration of the effect of fraternal and Christian words. If the Evangelical Alliance ever slackened in its labours, it would not be because there was not enough to do, nor work difficult enough to tax the judgment, knowledge, and experience of every one of its members. There was the whole sphere of the Continent, and not to mention other countries, he would allude more particularly to France. It would be well if English Christians cultivated greater acquaintance with the French Protestant Church. They were bound to them not only because of the memory of its martyrs, but because so many good men were driven from that country to England at the time of the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, where they had become earnest and useful members of society. Perhaps he might be excused for feeling somewhat warmly on that point, as he himself was descended from a Protestant refugee. The impression left upon his mind was, that France had not the amount of religious influence brought to bear upon it by England which its position and importance in the world deserved. He had been staying recently at Fontainebleau, and he could testify that the Protestants there were watched and scrutinised by the Sisters of Charity in the most persevering manner. If any tradesman was suspected of having a leaning towards Protestantism, these sisters would visit his shop and draw him out in conversation, and if their suspicions were confirmed they would spread the rumour abroad, so that the man would lose his custom. In conclusion, he wished to express his opinion that as a nation they were sinning against God by having music for mere amusement in the public parks on the Lord's-day. He could not help thinking that a neglect of the obligation to keep the Sabbath holy would lead to other offences against the law of God and of man, the evil of which could not be exaggerated. (Cheers.)

The Rev. J. H. Hinton, Hon. Secretary of the Baptist Union, said that one of the chief pleasures of his life was in attending the meetings of the Evangelical Alliance, on account of the entire catholicity of Christian feeling which prevailed there. In all Christian activities one was apt to get a little denominational, but in such meetings as these one could get out of the mere denominational element. Some persons told him that if he belonged to the Evangelical Alliance he must desert his principles as a Dissenter. He appealed to those who knew him whether he had deserted his principles. It was clearly understood at the formation of the Alliance that every member of it was to be perfectly free to carry out his personal convictions on matters of Church government; and, for one, if that freedom were not conceded to him, he could not conscientiously be a member of that society. (Hear, hear.)

The Rev. F. Greeves (Wesleyan) expressed his attachment to the principles of the Alliance, and suggested that its members might, with advantage to themselves, and to the interests of religion upon the Continent, more largely read and circulate Evangelical Christendom.

Dr. Kalopothakes, of Athens, said he could not well express his feelings of joy at being present for the first time at a meeting of the Evangelical Alliance. Great changes had taken place during the last thirty years in Greece. At the revolution of 1821 the republic accorded full religious liberty to its subjects, and the Bible was freely circulated and missionaries allowed to open schools. When the present kingdom was established, that freedom was restricted from year to year; until in 1840 the missionaries were persecuted, and the translation of the Scriptures publicly burned. Of late years, however, freedom had revived. He published a religious newspaper in Athens, and he could testify to the growth of liberty. An address had been presented by certain parties to the Patriarch of Constantinople, under the title of "The Most Holy and Worshipful Patriarch;" and he had freely commented upon it in his journal. A few years ago this would not have been tolerated. He hoped that the Evangelical Alliance would continue to grow in power and influence. (Cheers.)

The proceedings were brought to a close by singing and prayer.

WEDNESDAY, OCT. 15.—MORNING SITTING.

The sittings of the Conference were resumed on Wednesday morning, at half-past ten o'clock, under the presidency of the Rev. Dr. Macfarlane, minister of the United Presbyterian Church, Clapham.

The Rev. R. H. Webb, Rector of Essendon, read the 133rd Psalm and the 17th chapter of St. John, and the Rev. A. N. Somerville, of Glasgow, offered prayer.

Dr. Macfarlane then delivered the ANNUAL ADDRESS.

The Doctor spoke as follows:—

Christian Friends,—Within the fifteen or twenty minutes allowed to the opening address, it is impossible to discuss in full any topic; indulge me, then, with your attention to a few general observations. No one who witnessed the formation of the Evangelical Alliance in this hall, and of which this meeting is the sixteenth anniversary, can ever forget it. In itself, such a formation was quite an epoch in the history of earnest religion, and to us, who presided over its birth, a period not only of high solemnity, but of lasting instruction and influence. What lessons of wisdom and holiness have we learned ever since, at once from the disappointment of our fears and the realisation of our hopes. The institute itself was reared amid many difficulties—difficulties, too, of the most perplexing kind, the conservative and hesitations of pure and honourable minds—but, by God's blessing, we overcame every one of them. There were, also, prophecies of evil, that we were composed of heterogeneous elements, and must soon go to pieces; that we had no practical object, no distinctly specified purpose in view, and must needs dissolve of our own accord; that we were not sincere or genuine in our protestations of mutual love, and that, whether as Churchmen or Dissenters, we should soon feel ourselves so opposed to one another as to convert the Alliance into an arena of dispute, instead of preserving it as a fold of Christian love. Our past history has disproved all these croakings and forebodings. We are more welded together—more consolidated than ever. We have been neither dreamers in our councils nor luxuriants in our actions. We have done some service to the State and the Church. We have guided, by our prompt and wise interposition, the minds of statesmen into the path of justice and mercy; we have opened the prison door of martyrs, and let the oppressed go free; we have arrested persecution and sent it into its own place; we have confronted the Man of Sin on more than one of his seven-hilled iniquities; we have encouraged the timid confessor, and given voice to his eloquent testimony on behalf of God and truth; and, above all, perhaps, we have invaded the strongholds of religious bigotry and uncharitableness, and substituted in the bosoms and convictions of thousands of God's servants and people of every denomination the sentiment of esteem for the sneer of contempt, the confidence of brethren for the jealousy of rivals, and the love of the truth itself for the passions of mere partisanship. Though we had done nothing more than elevated brotherly love among Christians to its present high position, we should have earned our title to distinction as an eminently practical and useful society. I shall never forget the impression which the late Dr. Wardlaw made upon a small party of friends when returning from the formation of the Alliance in 1846. We were standing near him on the deck of the steamer that was carrying us from Liverpool to Glasgow; our talk was all about the wonderful things we had seen and heard and done in the hall, and one of us said something to this effect: "This Alliance seems to represent a mere sentiment—love. Of much action it is incapable—it can do nothing—it must be guiltless of good works.” Dr. Wardlaw immediately drew himself up, as was his wont when he meant to reply to an opponent, and with much firmness and feeling said, as near as I can recollect: “The Alliance does, indeed, represent a sentiment—I would rather call it a principle—it represents, because it embodies, Christian love; and what is stronger than love? what more surely prompts to generous actions? what disposes to more costly sacrifices? what commands more precious feelings? I know of nothing that is less abstract and more concrete than love among Christian men. It is the most desirable state for the Church to be in while she is militant; and the institution that succeeds in pulling down the strongholds of religious intolerance, bigotry, jealousy, and envy, deserves to be ranked amongst the most practical agencies of the day. If this Alliance succeeds, even in some measure, in the work which it has proposed to itself, none will have more reason to thank God for it than the parties who are now loudest in their declamations against it.” I need not say that hundreds of good men and true, from amongst all sections of the Christian Church, have endorsed these opinions; and many of them, now sitting at the same table in heaven, may peradventure be wondering how they ever could have underestimated, as one of the most potent principles of action, that high and holy passion by which even God Himself was moved to send His only begotten Son into this world to die in the room of sinners, and by which they themselves were carried safely over all the stormy surges of time into the tranquillity and joy of their glorified estate. In those days it was a question how long the Alliance was likely to last. That question presses still. It was never designed to last for ever. When its work is done it will retire from the field. We never said that the Alliance was a church, but that it represented the different sections into which, by the permission of our great Head, it has been divided. When these divisions are healed—when Christian men shall see eye to eye—when Ephraim shall no longer vex Judah, nor Judah Ephraim—when Christ’s prayer for the oneness; that is, the apparent oneness of His Catholic Church, shall be fully answered—then our Alliance shall become a dissolving view before the unveiling light of charity all over Christendom. It is in the very spirit of this Alliance that I pray God to make the necessity for its continuance of a few years. Happy shall His people be when the fold shall be seen to be one, as the Shepherd is but one, and when all shall join in the chorus of the song of Judah, “Open ye the gates, that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in.” Some institutions in our land and some of our patriarchs as to benevolence, and wisdom, and holiness, have earned the title of venerable, and venerable they are from years and deeds of virtue. I have no wish, however, that this institute of ours shall ever become venerable for such reasons. May it do its work so well, and may the Divine light fall upon that work in such efficacy, as to necessitate its disorganization. I am content enough with the claims which even already it can put forth to the appellative venerable. It may be young in years, but I feel that it is always old in memories and associations. Who that attended the formation meetings of this Alliance in this room need be reminded of that oecumenical gathering?—of the men of God from every region of the globe who came here to lift up their hands as the high priests of that love which is ineffaceable on our banners as on our hearts, and who, many of them, have passed away. Our fathers and founders were amongst the most venerable men in the world. Only remember Edward Bickersteth, John Angell James, Jabez Bunting, John Morrison, John Leifchild, the two Coxes, John Brown, Ralph Wardlaw, William Cunningham, Andrew and William Symington, Thomas Farmer—and it will be ceded, that if venerability can be affirmed of any society, on the score of its patrons’ excellences, it may be affirmed of ours. But the Alliance is heir to something better than the venerability of its fathers. It has fallen heir to their large-hearted and comprehensive Christianity. The children are not behind one whit. They bequeathed to us a noble inheritance, and we are not dishonouring it. Contrariwise, we aim at inhaling a still larger measure of the spirit of love, and at bringing our influence to bear upon a wider sphere. Nor are we doubtful of success. The time must come. Great is truth, and it must prevail. There is nothing so true as Divine love, and nothing so powerful. The Lord God of Salvation speed our plough, and usher in the harvest of millennial peace! The friends of the Alliance place their confidence in its growth and influence entirely upon its scriptural character. The two pillars on which it rests are taken out of the Bible. One of them came from the most illustrious of all the typical personages; the other from the great Antitype Himself. A very brief look at each shall bring this address to a close. 1. Our Old Testament pillar, as it may be called, is the 133rd Psalm, where David sings, “Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!” In this beautiful ode you find in harmonious integrity the principles upon which the Evangelical Alliance is founded. Let us look a little narrowly into its impressive preface. You will perceive that it describes a certain state of things in connexion with the Church—the state of unity; from which we are to understand that there is no necessity why the Church should ever be seen in any other state. There is, after all, but one Church, one mystical body of Christ, and that oneness consists in a positive identity among its members in the great essential articles of their faith. This is true of the Church, divide and subdivide herself as she may. Let her maintain her right of private judgment in the interpretation of Scripture. She never can have more than one faith. It is in this respect that they are all one in Christ Jesus; though not all within the human pale of one denomination. Again, the passage describes the position in or the relation to that state of unity which obtains amongst believers—they “dwell” in it and they “duell together” in it—which means, not only is it their common state as to individual possession, but they are associated in that state with one another—there they are actually located in spiritual juxtaposition. As the members of a family are all under one roof, and are bound together by the ties of nature, so do Christians live in one and the same temple of truth, and are linked together by the ties of grace. The ties of nature may undergo disruption, and the members of a family may be parted, but the ties of grace are indissoluble. Christ, the Head, and the Church, His body, are one in fellowship, sympathy, and duration. “Because He lives, they live” also, and together with Him. This verse also describes the parties who form this union. They are “brethren.” They have, therefore, a very near relationship, formed, not on the ground of their common humanity, but on that of their common Christianity. A man’s Christianity imports not so much his creed as his condition; his new birth, in fact, or adoption into that family of which God is the father, Christ the elder brother, and Heaven the home. All Christians are born in Zion, in the Church; and, by the regenerating power of one and the same Spirit, they are, therefore, spiritually related; and because of such relationship they must be associated. Being brethren, of course they love one another, and by the attractions of such Divine love they are as nearly joined to one another as individuals can be without losing their identity. They dwell together as brethren, or in the character and with the fondnesses and communities of brethren. Farther, the passage describes this state of thing in the Church to be both “good and pleasant.” First, it is “good,” that is, in itself or in its own nature, it is an unexceptionable thing. It is really an excellent state, the state of Christian unity. There is, there can be, no mixture of evil in it, for it supposes the absence of doctrinal error as to the truth in common held, the presence of every really sound and holy influence, the dismissal of discordant and conflicting tempers, and the reign over them of that charity which is more excellent even than their faith and hope, for it is written, “the greatest of these is charity.” And as unity is good, so it is fruitful of good. Its proper fruits are “love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; and against such there is no law.” Surely such a state may be compared to a “tree planted by the river of waters, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither, and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.” In short, so soon as ample justice is done by the Church herself to this state, she will accomplish all her prophecies, and through her light and love the nations shall be gathered unto the Shiloh. Now, from all this it must follow, that it is also a pleasant state—which means, what is really an axiom, that it is very agreeable and delightful for brethren so to dwell. Surely every member of this Alliance has felt it to be so, and the Church in her collective capacity shall yet break into Hallelujahs over the Divine experience. But who doubts it? Who even associates pain with a piece of perfect melody in music? He must be as the deaf adder who does so. God is one! God is love! and therefore He has ever an infinite satisfaction or complacency in Himself. But His Church also is one, and His Church also is love; therefore it is that in her blessed unity of faith and affection she feels a pleasure, shall I say a rapture of enjoyment, to which nothing can be compared but the absolute perfection of her bliss in her glorified state. And, in a word, all this we are called upon to “behold?” that is, we are seriously to study this question of unity in the Church—we are to analyse the principles asserted to lie in it—we are to believe that it is alike good and pleasant—and then we are as Christians to embody it in our constitution, and act upon it sincerely, practically, prayerfully, and confidently. 2. But we said that the second pillar of the Alliance came from the great Antitype Himself—even David’s Lord. This New Testament pillar is the well-known and deeply-pondered 17th chapter of the Gospel of John. Before our institute existed that intercessory prayer was much thought of as the security to the Church of the future union of her sections. But, after its formation, new light seemed to be cast upon its brilliant periods. At all events, we perused them with much more enlightened minds, and with deeper convictions of the duty devolving upon all who followed Christ to seek the healing of the divisions in Reuben. Without even attempting an exposition of this prayer, I may be allowed to call attention to what may be termed its four grand proportions—each distinct from the others, but all so united in one, that they unitedly conspire to secure the object for which our great Advocate prays. We do injustice to this matchless piece of intercession by restricting our interest in it to the clauses that directly refer to Christian union. This will appear if we mark the Divine method our Lord adopts. In the first place, He prays for their protection while in the world—while subjected to its temptations and persecutions; secondly, He prays for their consecration to His cause in that world; thirdly, for their union, in order to prosecute that cause; and lastly, for their final admission into the state of perfection in Heaven. Now, we are not at liberty to keep any of those blessings apart. It is a four-fold state that He contemplates—or a chain of four grand links which really binds His Church to His person, to His cause, to His heaven.

The sublime ultimatum, it will be noticed, is perfection, not here—not even in the united Church here, but in Heaven. Now we cannot dissociate this from the first blessing of all—separation from the world and preservation from its spirit; without holiness we can never see the Lord. Then the second blessing for which He pleads is the consecration of His people as preparatory to their working for the conversion of the world; but of what avail is their consecration without their union in heart, and thought, and effort? Hence the third petition is emphatically for such a union, in order that the world may believe that God had sent Him. All these blessings, however, come short of the ultimatum referred to—though kept from the evil that is in the world—though separated, dedicated, and qualified for their Lord's work—though united even in their views with regard to it, they are still remote from the one grand object of all this preparatory economy—the state of eternal life and joy which awaits them, and which, after all, is the only state in which their perfect union or absolute oneness is revealed. It becomes us, then, in our uses of this intercessory prayer, not to keep asunder what our Lord has joined together. In all our efforts for Christian union, let us remember that it is only a high degree of it to which the Church can, in this world, approach; and that our zeal and self-denial in this matter should be invariably fed and prompted by the sure hope, that when we leave the world, we are certain, in every sense of the word, to be one, as God and Christ are one. Many good men, we believe, keep back from this Alliance, because they consider Christian union to be hopeless. This is the necessary result of their not looking over the boundary of time, to see the Church so united, as not to have the semblance of division. Now, our Lord prays for her union on earth, so far as it can be reached, to prepare for and really to secure her absolute and perfected union in glory. If sanctification be a process gradually qualifying the individual for heaven, union here is also a process equally indispensable to celestial completeness and compactness. The man who declines seeking after growth in personal holiness, because perfection in this world is unattainable, is every whit as reasonable as he is who is disaffected to the Evangelical Alliance on the ground that absolute unity among Christian denominations is in this world impracticable. Our duty manifestly is to aim at such unity, feeling that these aims have the Divine sanction, and are powerfully helping forward the solemn cause to its eternal throne. At all events, an institution resting upon two such sacred pillars as these may defy hostility. It is indeed a house built upon rocks, and can never be swept away before any tempestuous inundations. On the contrary, as time wears on, and the final purposes of God are accomplished, the edifice where Christian union was enshrined and sheltered shall be converted into the one grand temple of Christianity, whose priesthood shall not include all whom the blood of the Lamb has cleansed, and whose destinies shall be to conduct the Bride, the Lamb's Wife, all fair and spotless now, into the presence of the King, who is "immortal, invisible, and eternal!" The key-note struck at our birth was love—that note has thrilled and quivered in many noble hearts ever since—and is still most distinctly heard in the sublime diapason of our concord. The anthems of all nations shall die away into silence—but the song of Christ's flock shall reverberate throughout eternity—"Whether there be prophecies, they shall fail: whether there be tongues, they shall cease: whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away—but charity never faileth!" Consigning futurity to God, let us continue to play as well as we can upon this our instrument of two strings. Evoking the spirit of love from Hebrew melody and mediatorial pleading, let us leave our union minstrelsy to tell its own story, and soon, it may be, these fine lines of Dryden may be so far true of our Alliance concert:—

"When Judah struck the chorded shell,
His listening brethren stood around,
And, wondering, on their faces fell
To worship the celestial sound; Less than a God they thought there could not dwell
Within the hollow of that shell
That spoke so sweetly and so well."

"Wherefore, brethren, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace, and the God of love and peace shall be with you. Amen."

The address was followed by singing, and by prayer offered by the Rev. E. T. Prust, Northampton, and the Rev. S. Minton, the Chairman pronouncing the benediction.

The business meeting began at twelve o'clock, and Sir Culling E. Eardley, Bart., presided. Prayer was offered by the Rev. Dr. Hoby. Sir Culling, in his address, adverted to the imprisonment of the Protestants in Spain. Alhama and Matamoros had been condemned to the galleys. The friends of liberty of worship were deeply indebted to the press of this country, and (except La Monde and La France) to the Paris papers also, for the spirited way in which this Spanish question had been taken up. (Cheers.)

THE ANNUAL REPORT.

The Rev. James Davis, one of the secretaries, read the Sixteenth Annual Report. The report stated that it had been feared this year, owing to questions exciting much controversy, and to the revival of historical recollections, that the cause of Christian union would be impeded, and the Alliance suffer from alienation and diminished support; but happily these fears had proved groundless, and the Alliance had prospered, increasing in numbers and in funds, and extending its home and foreign operations. The report lamented the death of several distinguished members, to whom it paid an affectionate tribute. It referred to the week of prayer at the commencement of the year, which had been observed in every quarter of the globe, and had been greatly blessed. After mentioning a number of facts which have been already brought under the notice of our readers, the report concluded by urging members to act upon the principles of the Alliance, as the visible unity of Christians must precede the conversion of the world.

From the financial statement, read by Mr. Finch, treasurer, it appeared that the past year had been very favourable in a pecuniary point of view. The income was 2,030*l.*, and the expenditure left a balance of 190*l.* against the society, as compared with 459*l.* balance against the society last year. He mentioned Mr. John Henderson, of Park, Glasgow, and Mr. R. C. L. Bevan, both of whom had very liberally contributed towards the relief of the Alliance from the debt under which they had so long laboured.

On the motion of Colonel Young, of Bedford, seconded by Colonel Bazett, of Reading, the report and the statement of accounts were adopted.

BUSINESS DISCUSSIONS.

On the motion of the Rev. S. Minton, Sir Culling E. Eardley, Bart., was appointed President of the British Branch of the Alliance, having hitherto been Chairman of the Committee of Council only—a post involving duties to which his failing health had rendered him unequal.

Sir Culling, in reply, said that he was very much obliged for this expression of their renewed confidence. He hoped the change now effected would prove beneficial to the general interests of the Alliance. For sixteen years he had been chairman of the committee. Whatever change might be made in these matters, there would be no change in the interest which he felt in the welfare of the Alliance. (Cheers.)

The Rev. Dr. Robson, on behalf of the Glasgow sub-divisional committee, submitted two resolutions. The first declared that the Alliance had reason to be grateful for the success which had attended its efforts to promote unity and religious liberty. The second called upon the council to consider Popery, infidelity, and Lord's-day desecration, and to facilitate united action on these questions. The proposed opening of the Botanic Gardens, Dublin and Edinburgh, afforded opportunities for such united action. He moved that they be received.

Mr. John Henderson seconded the motion, and, after some conversation, in which the Rev. W. M. Bunting, Mr. H. Frere, Dr. Hoby, the Rev. S. Minton, the Rev. W. Arthur, Rev. N. T. Prust, Dr. Hoppus, and Mr. Roberts took part, both resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The Rev. Alex. McEwen submitted the suggestion on behalf of the Glasgow branch—that the number of the council should be reduced to the original number of 100; that the days of its meetings should be altered, so as to enable ministers from a distance to attend, and to return to their homes before the end of the week—and that the sub-divisional committees should be kept better informed of the doings of the council and of the operations of the Alliance, so as to enable them to serve it better. The reduction of the council was debated and carried; the question of the day of meeting was left for the consideration of the new council, and on the third question there was a division. The motion was that the committee should be instructed to forward an abstract of the proceedings on as early a day as possible after such monthly meeting, and the amendment was that the matter should be remitted to the new council for them to consider the propriety of doing so. For the motion 21, for the amendment 20.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER.

The Rev. A. N. Somerville moved the following resolution referring to the week of special prayer at the commencement of next year; which was seconded by Rev. J. Kelly, Liverpool:—

“This Conference renews its commendation of the observance of a week of special united prayer at the commencement of the year; it approves of the circular inviting to such observance in the year 1863; and, while it records its devout thankfulness to God for the many blessings which have in various parts of the world followed these seasons of special prayer, it earnestly prays that at the commencement of the ensuing year the spirit of grace and of supplication may be yet more abundantly poured out upon the assemblies of the saints.”

THE PERSECUTIONS IN SPAIN.

The Chairman said that their brethren, Matamoros and Alhama, were in prison under a final sentence, and the only question for the Alliance was—What can be done? Let it be known what the sentence was. On Monday Mr. Reuter, at our request, telegraphed to Spain, asking certain specific questions, and the intelligence in that morning's papers was an answer to those questions. Matamoros recently wrote to a friend in England that the Queen of Spain was expected at Granada in the course of a tour she was making to the chief cities in the South of Spain. Her Majesty was to arrive at Granada that day week; and it was said that Sir John Crampton, British Ambassador, was to have an interview with her there, and that the intention of Government was that the Queen should announce the pardon of Matamoros and Alhama. Instead of their pardon, intelligence had been received of their condemnation. For some days it was considered that the two things might be compatible, and that the Government had so arranged that the trial and the appeal should take place just before the visit of her Majesty, that she might have the honour of pardoning the prisoners; but all hope of the was now relinquished. The telegram which announced the sentences also stated that her Majesty had been at Granada, and had been received with demonstrations of loyalty and patriotism. The Queen must have passed under the windows of the prison in which Matamoras and Alhama were confined. It remained for the Alliance to consider what it would do. Their brethren had been tried for the crime of Protestantism, and nothing else. Efforts to bring other charges against them had been made, and had entirely failed, and admittedly and avowedly they were to be punished for their religion. They were to be sent to a convict establishment in Africa, and there, in striped clothes, they were to trail gun-balls, or do degrading work. He did not think that grace required them to restrain their indignation—they might be angry and yet not sinful. He felt very angry; and he trusted his anger would not prevent him considering what was the best that could be done. The Spanish Government was not proof against the power of concentrated public opinion. He hoped they would think it right to do the thing well, or else to do nothing at all. (Hear, hear.) He suggested that in this country there should be extensively signed a declaration, very respectful in its terms, to the Spanish Government and the Queen, appealing to the generosity and the justice of the Spanish nation, and referring particularly to what Protestants had done for Catholics in other countries, that the endorsement of our Government should be obtained, and that this declaration should be taken to Madrid by an influential deputation. The Foreign-office was not cold on such matters (as some supposed); it was a delicate thing for a minister to take the initiative; but it was much less difficult to endorse the action of the Church. Such an example would be followed in Protestant countries; and he believed that France and America would readily join them. If such a remonstrance as he had indicated were carried to the gates of the palace of the Queen, he believed that the whole Spanish nation would respond, and would refuse to remain the only persecutors, with the exception of the Pope, on the continent of Europe. (Hear, hear.) He had no doubt that the Prime Minister of Austria, Count Schmerling, would endorse such a proceeding. Marshall O'Donnell, the Spanish Prime Minister, was in favour of religious liberty; but he had to contend against backstairs influence in the palace, and against all the power of the priesthood. If all Europe united in this appeal, the Spanish Prime Minister would feel strengthened to do what, as a Churchman and a gentleman, he was bound to do—viz., to liberate the sufferers and to reciprocate towards Protestants the generosity they had manifested towards his co-religionists. ("Hear, hear," and applause.)

The Rev. Dr. Massey moved the following resolution:—

"That this assembly has heard with the deepest regret that the final sentence of nine and eight years respectively, of penal servitude, has been pronounced upon Senor Matamoras and Alhama, and that the Royal prerogative of mercy has not yet been exercised on their behalf. This Conference commits the subject to the Council, with instructions to take such steps as they may think necessary under the circumstances. That the best thanks of the Conference are hereby offered to Major-General Alexander for his service, so wisely and kindly tendered, to promote the liberation of our brethren by his visit to Madrid."

The resolution was briefly seconded by the Hon. and Rev. Leland Noel, and unanimously agreed to.

The Rev. Dr. King concluded the proceedings with prayer.

EVENING SITTING.

CHRISTIAN UNION.

The Evening Meeting commenced at half-past six o'clock.

J. Henderson, Esq., took the chair, in the first instance, but was afterwards succeeded by Sir Culling Eardley.

After a short devotional service,

The Rev. T. R. Birks delivered an address on "The Progress of and Best Means of Promoting Christian Union." He said that it was important to distinguish between Christian union and the union of Christians. Christians were imperfect creatures, and might possibly unite in what was wrong, as well as in what was right; but they were united in the love of truth, which would prepare them for the love of heaven. Theirs was not a union of sectarian bigotry, nor of mere prejudice, nor of party passion, nor of vague latitudinarian sentiments, which had no relation to the truth of Christ, but a union derived from the Spirit, leading to Christ, glorifying Christ, and preparing them for final union with Christ in the kingdom of heaven. There were three great principles which were involved in the progress of Christian union, and which lay at its basis. They must remember that they were saved by the grace of God in Christ, and must exercise humility. The second principle was the recollection of the great truth, with all that was implied in it, that the Church was a body of believers called by God out from the world to be partakers of His grace, moulded in the image of Christ, and prepared for heaven. The third principle was the prospect of the good things to come. If their thoughts were limited to present experience, they would be continually cast down and discouraged, as there was so much to mar Christian union in the present life. There would be a perfected unity hereafter. Our fellow-Christians were now being continually removed, and the work of the Church had to be done afresh in each generation. Every child of God, as Baxter said, came into this world in a state of ignorance, and had everything to learn, but in heaven there would be no drawbacks to perfect union. There were three main lights in which they might consider the best means of promoting Christian union—personal, social, and ecclesiastic. In reference to the first, they must remember the maxim, "Charity begins at home." They would never advance effectually as an Alliance in promoting the cause of Christian love on a wide scale unless there was a growth of love in individual hearts in the members of the Alliance. There were three fundamental principles, by applying which in our own hearts love would be promoted. The first was the principle of humility; the second was knowledge of the truth of God—all the disputes and quarrels among Christians arising in some way from ignorance and error; and the third was the looking forward to perfect union hereafter. With regard to the social means of promoting Christian union, the thought which chiefly impressed him was that they ought not to rely chiefly upon gregarious effort. Great gatherings were useful. There was a stimulus connected with the bringing together great multitudes from time to time; but still it must be remembered that in the economy of nature the dew did more than the tropical thunderstorm. What was needed in connexion with the Evangelical Alliance was not simply an extensive organization, nor merely parochial meetings on a large scale, nor Continental or English conferences once a-year, but the keeping very close to and acting upon the Saviour's words, "Where two or three meet together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." This principle had been to some extent carried out in social prayer-meetings on a small scale; and he would suggest that it would be well for Christians of different denominations to meet together socially in tea-meetings, and otherwise for religious conversation, reading the Scriptures, and the consideration of the various providences passing around them. The third means of promoting the progress of union was more difficult to refer to. It was easier for a few Christians whose hearts were attached to certain doctrines to cultivate union than really to diffuse the same spirit among the great bodies of Christians who had strong prejudices or strong causes of separation one from another. Speaking in a sort of modified sense of the word, the great proportion of the members of the Alliance were probably Low Churchmen—that is, they were less strongly attached to the distinctive features and special peculiarities of the communities to which they belonged than to the Church of Christ as a whole. It was clearly an easier thing to cultivate union among themselves than among those who stood aloof because they could not reconcile their conscientious attachment to their own special ecclesiastical body with membership with the Alliance. It was a wide and difficult subject, but he thought they might safely apply the three principles he had named—humility, love of truth, anticipation of heaven. If Christians would look at the state of their several denominations in the light of God's truth, they would find much to humble them as members of that communion, and much to remove alienation, bitterness, and contention. Take, for instance, the Established Church, which was constituted on principles the most wide and comprehensive as to individual membership—so wide, that many other Christians thought they were inconsistent with the Word of God. It ought to be a source of humility to members of the Establishment that from the nature of its constitution it included a great many unconverted persons, who could only be viewed as Christians, if at all, by the widest extension of the meaning of the phrase. But if they turned to other bodies that were constituted on more strict principles they would find much inconsistency among those who professed to be children of God; and besides, it was possible for even sincere Christians to be narrow-minded and censorious, so that there was quite enough to humble them in the presence of a heart-searching God. If the principles he had referred to were carried out by every member of the Alliance it would be a very great step towards the promotion of the great object they had in view. Lastly, they ought to encourage each other by the recollection that they were seeking humbly to do God's work in God's strength.

The Rev. Alfred Barrett (Wesleyan), of Richmond, having remarked upon the importance of the views to which Mr. Birks had given expression,

The Rev. W. Arthur said that there was perhaps one sentiment in the valuable address which they had just listened to with which he felt disposed to differ. He felt that the stronger the convictions which a Christian entertained about doctrinal matters or Church government, the better position he was in for uniting in a spirit of love with those who differed from him. He should deeply regret if the Alliance were to be looked upon as the means of weakening the attachment of individuals to their several denominations. (Hear, hear.) Those who objected to the Alliance on the ground that it was not practical, might as well object to Christmas family gatherings. Such gatherings seldom added anything to the commercial balance-sheet of the year, but they were very effective in promoting affection, unity, and concord, and often were the means of indirectly benefitting the family more than any ordinary day's work.

Professor Balfour, of Edinburgh University, moved the following resolution:—

"That this Conference expresses its conviction that the times in which we live emphatically demand that union of all real Christians, belonging to all countries and communities, which our blessed Lord both prayed for and enjoined upon His disciples. The Conference ventures to ask for the earnest prayers of all God's people for an increase of this great blessing, and would remind them of the resolution adopted by the General Conference of Paris, in 1855, calling upon their brethren to unite in prayer for this object every Monday forenoon. And it also expresses its hope that the Council will be led, during the ensuing year, to adopt such measures for the diffusion of the principles of the Evangelical Alliance as will conduce to the same end."

The Rev. R. Sewell, of Londonderry (Independent), in seconding the resolution, said that it was a fact that Popery was obtaining a very strong hold upon the people among certain localities, and he believed that, if there had been more union among Christians in times gone by, this would not have been the case.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

The Rev. W. M. Bunting moved the following resolution:—

"That the Earl of Roden, Lord Calthorpe, Hon. A. Kinnaid, and J. Henderson, Esq., be requested to act as Vice-Presidents of the Alliance."

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Hanson, and carried unanimously.

THE CIVIL WAR IN AMERICA.

The following communication from the Paris Committee to Sir Culling Eardley was read:—

"Paris, Oct. 14, 1862.

"Dear Sir Culling.—Our committee of Evangelical Alliance which met just now asks me to write in their name to your annual meeting, in order to express our deep sympathy and affection. We should have liked to send a deputation to your branch, but just at this time of the year it would have been most difficult to us, and the more so as we have to send a deputation to the general assembly of the French branch, which takes place at the end of this month in Geneva. We must, therefore, confine ourselves to a letter, and assure you that we take a hearty interest in your proceedings. May the Lord fill your meeting with His gracious presence, and direct all the speeches, all the prayers, all the resolutions, for the best of His blessed Church!

"You will be glad to hear, dear Sir Culling, that we have decided that an address of the French Christians will be sent to our American brethren. We are not yet come to a conclusion on the following point: Will the address be sent in the name of the French branch of the Alliance, or will it be originated merely by the Alliance, but submitted to the individual signature of the French-speaking Christians? But we are one on this point—that it will be the expression of our deepest sympathy to our brethren in the North that we will utter the conviction that the only cause of this awful struggle is the question of slavery, and that we cannot encourage too much our friends across the Atlantic in the steps which are now taken to do away with that abominable institution of slavery. We shall tell them that we hope it will be the result of the present war—and that in our opinion the terrible sacrifice of lives and treasure will not have been too great a price for such a blessing. This is the general feeling of Evangelical Christians in France. We have not a single religious paper which is not a warm supporter of the cause of liberty, freedom, and Christian civilisation—which is represented by the North—against the slave-oligarchy of the South. Nobody of us would think to put the two causes on the same level, to give encouragement to both; for as the Southern Christians consider as a dreadful evil the emancipation of the slaves, which is our greatest wish, it would be almost a mockery to address them in this circumstance. Moreover, they are shut up in their blockaded country, and our address could not reach them. An address directed to both would miss its aim for one party, and grieve the other exceedingly. Silence would be then much better than any such expression, which would do harm instead of good.

"But I forget, dear Sir Culling, that I write you in all haste from the study of my friend, M. Monod. I must conclude. Give our best love to all the brethren, and believe me still, dear Sir Culling, very sincerely yours,

(Signed) "G. FISCH."

Sir Culling Eardley: I wish to take the very earliest opportunity of saying that in an assembly like this I should deprecate our doing or saying anything on the spur of the moment which would commit us to anything whatever, except to that which every British Christian feels—grief and heartfelt compassion for a branch of the English race involved in a fratricidal war, and the hope that the war will issue in the abolition, more or less gradual, of slavery. Having said thus much, I shall perhaps be pardoned for saying a few words on the question, which is an Alliance question, if ever there was one—the question of American slavery. It nearly prevented the formation of the Alliance in 1846, from the refusal of the American brethren to join with their European friends condemning slavery. After the constituent assembly of various countries in London, in August, had declined taking action on slavery, the constituent assembly for the United Kingdom met, as you remember (in November, I think), at Manchester, and founded the British branch. It was then made one of our fundamental principles that no owner of his fellow-man shall be a member of our branch. Consequently, I am in my right (dans mon droit, as the French say) in speaking to-day, in the Alliance, on the subject of slavery. Now, Gentlemen, there has just now been issued a proclamation of President Lincoln against slavery. I shall not say a word about the motives which led to that proclamation, nor about its probable effect upon the slave community of the South. This only I will say, that every true-born Englishman hates slavery, and emphatically hates slave-breeding for the market. Slave-breeding, as distinguished from slavery, is slave-trading. Your fathers, led by Wilberforce, put down the slave-trading by sea, but I would have you to remember that you have still got the slave-trade by land. Englishmen emphatically hate this abomination. Whatever many of us may think about proclamations of total and sudden emancipation of all slaves, there is not a man or a woman, or scarcely a child, in this kingdom, that would not rejoice at the instant emancipation of all slaves bred for sale in the Border States. And now having said thus much (and I mean to add no more) about the great anti-slavery proclamation of the North, I wish to turn for one moment to the South. Gentlemen, we have many brethren there, as well as in the North—brethren, if you please, deluded as to the evils of sin and slavery, but brethren still. Now I have a word to say to these Southern brethren. Southern brethren, you are freetraders, and therefore you know what the word competition means. Now I should like to whisper in your ears, or rather (if you would not think it unkind or unchristian), to thunder in your ears the word competition. Compete with the President Lincoln! Take the wind out of his sails! He is emancipating (some say) your slaves badly. Do you it well. He is doing it as an act of war. Do you it as a measure of peace. He is doing it instantly. Do you it safely and gradually. He declares every negro shall be free at the New Year. Do you declare that every child born after the New Year shall be free. Do you give every negro the right of buying his freedom at a price fixed by law. You want troops; do you declare that every negro who will serve in your army shall instantly be a free man. Take measures of this sort; and not only will you turn away from yourselves the possibility of a terrible catastrophe—not only will you, such of you as are real Christians, satisfy the exigencies of your own consciences, but you will probably lay a foundation in the respect and sympathy of Europe, on which it is not impossible that the superstructure of peace may hereafter be constructed.

The Rev. W. Arthur said that the Southern States were freetraders only as regards Northern produce, but protectionists in everything that the South produced. He had always been an anti-slavery man, but his convictions had deepened into a settled passion since he had been to America and had an opportunity of looking behind the scenes. The daily press of this country were taking for the most part a course in references to the American war which would bring the English name into disrepute, and seriously compromise the national character for truthfulness. The Southerners looked upon the so-called anti-slavery sentiment in England as a political ruse to promote dissension between the North and South, whilst the North regarded it as less powerful than the money interest which the nation had in the Cotton States. He hoped that the Conference would give a deep and solemn deliverance on the subject, so as to remove as far as possible this impression. He thought that they ought to show that they did not indulge a worldly animosity against any man because he was a "Yankee," and also that there was strong religious affection entertained by Christians in England to their brethren in America.

The Rev. W. Harris said he deeply regretted the utterance of the sentiments which they had heard from the chair, because he believed they would give pain to many minds on the other side of the Atlantic. The North had sins enough to answer for, but on the question of slavery were not to be compared with the South, and it was hardly the proper position for England to occupy, to wait and see which vied the highest for our favour. Englishmen could not forget that it was the Southern party which passed the Fugitive Slave Law.

Mr. Corderoy, the Rev. Mr. Towers (of Birkenhead), the Rev. S. Minton, and the Rev. Dr. Urwick, having spoken,

The Rev. T. R. Birks said that there was a strong anti-slavery feeling in this country, and, at the same time, a feeling in favour of the South on constitutional grounds. If the Alliance undertook to act upon the principle that slavery was abstractedly wrong as a Christian principle, that ought to be embodied in the basis of their constitution. Take it in the concrete, every one present would condemn slavery as they would condemn cruelty in every form, but as an abstract question it was fairly open to difference of opinion. The first mention of it in the Bible was in connexion with a Divine promise to Shem, and the last mention of it was not in formal condemnation, but bond and free were both spoken of in the same evil confederacy against Christ. He quite agreed with the remarks of the chairman on the subject of what he termed the land trade; but if they went beyond that, they came upon delicate ground, involving difficult and critical questions. If the Alliance dealt with practical questions as such, they would be in danger of introducing controversy; and if they laid down a principle upon slavery, why should they not do so upon other moral and political questions? (Hear, hear.)

The Rev. Alex. M'Ewen, of Glasgow, thought they might with propriety express their deep sympathy with America, and their earnest prayer that God would grant them a speedy deliverance.

The Rev. W. Harris proposed that the subject should be referred to a sub-committee, with instructions to bring up a report in the morning.

The Rev. Dr. Waddington seconded the motion.

The Rev. R. Sewell (Londonderry) was sorry that Mr. Birks should have said anything which might be construed into a defence of slavery.

The Rev. W. M. Bunting said that his mind recoiled from what might be the inferences drawn from the speech of his dear friend, Mr. Birks.

The Rev. T. R. Birks simply meant that it was inconsistent to take any step which was not warranted by the articles of their association.

After some further discussion, in which Mr. Ellis, the Rev. Dr. Fry, and the Rev. Mr. Towers took part,

The Chairman said that the very fact of the Alliance declining to admit any person to the fellowship who was a holder of slaves virtually committed it to an anti-slavery opinion.

A committee consisting of Sir Culling Eardley, the Rev. Messrs. Birks, Arthur, Harris, Towers, M'Ewen, Dr. Urwick, and Mr. Fowler, was appointed to consider the best course to be pursued in this matter, and report to the Conference.

The proceedings closed with the benediction.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16.

The Conference was preceded by a devotional meeting, under the presidency of the Rev. F. S. C. Chalmers, B.D., Rector of Beckenham. At its close the Rev. Dr. Hugh Allen moved a series of practical resolutions, being the same as those embodied in the constitution of the Alliance, and intended for the guidance of its members in their relation to one another and to the other Christians.

THE CIVIL WAR IN AMERICA.

Sir C. E. Eardley, Bart., having taken the chair, the Rev. J. S. Jenkinson, Vicar of Battersea, engaged in prayer.

The report of the committee of nomination of the new Council was read by the Rev. James Davis, and the appointment of the Council moved by the Hon. and Rev. Leland Noel, seconded by the Rev. W. Harris, and carried unanimously.

The Chairman said he was happy to say that the committee appointed last night on the subject of America had come to a unanimous report, and a resolution on the subject would now be moved.

The Rev. T. R. Birks said that the report was divided into two portions—a reply to the communication from Paris, and a resolution on the subject of the American war. It had been framed so as to meet the scruples of what might be a minority in that assembly, and at the same time express very substantially the sentiments of the majority. The following was the report, the adoption of which he begged to move:

“That the fraternal communication received from the Paris branch be affectionately acknowledged; that the best thanks of the Conference be conveyed to our French brethren for their expressions of warm interest in the operations and success of our branch of the Alliance, with the assurance that we participate in their deep sympathy with our common brethren in America in the fearful calamities which have sprung from the civil war now raging.—Resolved, that this Conference desire to express their deep sorrow for the continuance of the civil war in America, and the fearful amount of bloodshed and suffering to which it has led. Believing that sin is the cause of God's sore judgment, and that the evils connected with the maintenance of slavery in the South, and complicity with those evils in the North, are one great cause of the solemn visitation, they renew the expression of their earnest prayer that peace may be restored, that these evils and all others which have led to these calamities may be removed, and the immense resources and energies of the Americans themselves be set free to promote the cause of the Gospel of peace and love. They desire further to record their convictions as British Christians, that the duty of our country is to read in this war, not a warrant for self-righteous pride, but a loud call to humiliation, prayer, and repentance, lest our own many national sins should draw down upon us, in turn, the judgments of God. That, considering further the distress thus occasioned to large classes in our own country, they recommend that the second Sunday in November be made an occasion for public and private confession of sin, and special prayer on these grave subjects, so far as practicable, in the churches of Christ and Christian families through the land.”

The Rev. Dr. Massie moved the adoption of the resolutions, which would meet the sensibilities of the minority, whilst expressing the convictions and sympathies of all English Christians. We in England are apt to forget the difficulties arising from close connexion with slavery, and to cast too much blame upon the American churches. No doubt, many English Christians were implicated in West Indian slavery, without seeing that sin was involved—and that slavery was 5,000 miles distant from us, whilst slavery and its concomitants permeated American society. Their American brethren were more to be pitied than blamed, yet he would deprecate compassion for and commiseration with those implicated in slavery. He believed that America, and England too, were suffering on account of their connexion with slavery. He did not wish to say hard things of cotton-spinners; but he regarded our suffering as a judgment, which man could not ward off, and could hardly mitigate.

The reply and resolutions were read clause by clause, and adopted unanimously.

The Rev. A. Fraser, of Glasgow, in the name of the Conference, expressed their acknowledgments to the committee for drawing up resolutions so ably expressing the feelings of the members.

THE LORD'S-DAY AT HOME AND ABROAD.

The Rev. H. Schmetslau, Foreign Secretary of the Alliance, read a paper prepared by M. Alexandre Lombard, of Geneva, on the Lord's-day. It will be found in the earlier part of our present number.

The Rev. J. Davis read two communications on this subject, one from the Rev. Andrew Thomson, D.D., of Edinburgh, and the other from Mr. Palk, ex-Mayor of Southampton.

The Rev. Dr. Thomson said: My chief confidence, under God, is in maintaining and extending among our people a belief in the Divine authority of the institution of the Lord's-day. There appear, at least in Scotland, to be periodical assaults upon the Divine obligation of the Sabbath, recurring at times that might almost be calculated; and these occasions, as well as others, should be seized upon for reviving in the public mind, through the pulpit and the press, a sense at once of its permanent and universal authority and of its beneficent tendency. I do not know how it may be in London and in other English cities and provinces, but in our own Edinburgh, at the present moment, an attempt, said to be prompted by the London Sunday League, is being made by a certain portion of our newspaper press to introduce among us the distinction of "canonical hours"—allow a certain portion of Sabbath time for public worship, and give its remaining hours to recreation. This is the spirit and bearing of their present proposal. I need not say to any member of the Evangelical Alliance, that no such distinction as this is known within the bounds of the Bible, or in the Divine form of the Sabbath-law. I need not say that this law demands the whole day for God, and that if we are to derive even their proper amount of benefit from the public ordinances of religion, the hours which intervene or follow must be consecrated to more private and varied religious exercises. The first thing, then, to be done, is for our ministers and public religious teachers, at home and abroad, to make themselves thoroughly master of the Sabbath argument, and with calm confidence in its impregnable force, to present it before their people, until they are sure that they have carried with them general conviction and sympathy. And, in like manner, let rich Christian laymen and public societies not grudge the expenditure of a few hundred pounds to carry the argument and the influence, by means of the press, beyond the immediate range of the pulpit into the midst of the half-instructed and half-convinced masses of our population. It is incumbent on the friends of the Sabbath to watch and mark well the tactics of its adversaries. So far as my Scottish experience goes, I have observed that recreation for the working man is the most frequent plea for Sabbath desecration, and that, in concessions to this cry of a false philanthropy, the Sabbath is sought to be stolen, bit by bit, from its legitimate and hallowed uses. And, to give the cry a greater look of plausibility, we are sometimes told that God can be seen and worshipped in the beauties of nature, which are the works of His hands. Now, to meet this plea, next to informing the general mind with the rule of Scripture in reference to the keeping of the Sabbath, I know of nothing so important as saturating the popular mind with statistics. While admitting that the devout contemplation of the handiworks of God is a proper part of Sabbath exercise, it ought to be stated that what is commonly called "admiring the beauties of nature" does not partake of this character, and that Sunday excursion-trains, in which men seek what Mr. Rogers has happily called "gregarious excitement," are just about the last things in the world to favour and foster religious meditation. And it ought to be further proclaimed fearlessly, and everywhere, that there is no kindness to the working man so real or so great as that of preserving to him the whole of his Sabbath rest, and that there is no cruelty so great as that of robbing him of any part of it; but that it cannot be retained as a rest unless it be preserved and used as a religious institute. It is a delicate question, on which I have no doubt there will be found diversity of opinion in the Alliance, as among good men outside of it, how far the interference of the civil power is to be invoked in favour of the Sabbath-day. Delicate, however, though the question be, I think there are several things on which the Alliance will be found to be nearly unanimous—that, from the very nature of the case, the religious observances of the Sabbath can in no degree be enforced. Indeed, nothing religious admits of being compelled by mere material coercion or power; but then the Sabbath is a divinely-chartered rest, as well as a religious institute; and it seems to me at least to be quite within the province of a Government like ours to protect all classes of the community in the enjoyment of this rest; and, moreover, it seems to be the duty of Churches, and of Christian citizens, to insist that Government offices and institutions, which may be said to belong to the nation, shall not be permitted to trench in their management on the Sabbath-law. Dr. Thomson next referred to the duty incumbent upon heads of families to do all in their power to preserve the Sabbath to the land, especially by endeavouring to make the Sabbath hours at home interesting and happy to the younger members of the family. He concluded by some forcible remarks on the fact, that all our missionary churches and stations throughout the world keep the Sabbath—in other words, that the Sabbath-keeping type of Christianity is the form of it which is spreading over the earth.

Mr. Palk gave a brief history of the Sabbath question in Southampton, and stated that great benefit had resulted from the operation of certain clauses in the Improvement Act passed in 1844, and intended to promote the better observance of the Lord's-day. By these clauses public-houses and beer-shops are not allowed to be opened from twelve o'clock on Saturday night till one o'clock on the Lord's-day; also all shops and places of business are kept closed the entire day, and no goods are allowed to be even exposed for sale. On the assembling of the Commissioners under the Improvement Act, an effort was made to bring forward such clauses as would prevent cab proprietors sending their cabs on the public stands or ply for hire on the Lord's-day. Two clauses securing this result were passed unanimously; and so beneficial had been the result, that the inspector of police, within two or three weeks of the commencement of the operation of the act, spoke of it as having produced such a moral change in the character of the town, that a less number of policemen would effect all that was done before by the force, and that the cases of drunkenness brought before the magistrates were considerably diminished.

The Rev. W. L. Thornton said that in the various assaults which had been made on the Sabbath-day, the Divine authority of the day had been untouched. It was important that the Sabbath should be made to appear a delightful day. He strongly urged upon Christians the duty of abstaining from using public conveyances on that day.

The Rev. T. Curme, Vicar of Sandford, moved :—

"That we rejoice greatly at the intelligence which has been communicated to us of the interest manifested in Switzerland in the promotion of the due observance of the Lord's-day. Our best wishes attend our brethren in the cantons of Genoa, Vaud, Neuchatel, Basle, Ville, and elsewhere, in their endeavours to extend this influence among their fellow-citizens. It must be a great satisfaction to M. le Professor Godet to find that his paper, read at the Geneva Conference, is likely to result in so much benefit to his country. We trust that the example of Switzerland, where so many difficulties have to be contended with, will have a beneficial effect upon us in the United Kingdom, and that in other countries in Christendom the subject will occupy the place in the thoughts and efforts of the Lord's people which its importance demands."

F. Wills, Esq., of Clevedon, seconded the motion.

Dr. Marriott (Stuttgart) had circulated hundreds of thousands of tracts in Germany, chiefly those of Dr. Thomson, of Edinburgh, and much good had been done. He once had a private conversation on the subject with the late King of Prussia; and Sunday military drill was soon afterwards stopped, whilst it was ordered that letter sorters and others should have the opportunity of attending service once a-day at least. He regretted that so many British Christians travelled on the Continent on Sunday, and that American episcopal missionaries, of whom there were twelve in Germany and North Switzerland, did so too. He wished the committee of the Wesleyan Missionary Society would instruct their missionaries not to travel on that day.

A rev. gentleman said that the majority in this country disapproved of Sabbath labour, and the Government ought to protect the majority.

The Chairman used public vehicles on the Sunday, when necessity compelled, but always stipulated that the drivers should attend service too. He suggested that cabs should be ready in the yards to meet cases of necessity, thinking that the public would prefer to engage such cabs rather than those which were on the stands or plied for hire.

The Rev. Dr. Urwick thought that some action should be taken by the Alliance on the subject of closing public houses; but,

After some discussion, it was resolved to refer that subject to the Executive Council.

The resolution was then adopted.

THE VICEROY OF EGYPT.

The Rev. Mr. Trestrail, of Greenwich, moved, and Professor Hoppus seconded the following resolution, which was carried unanimously :—

"That this Conference approves the proceedings of the Committee of Council in conveying an address to the Viceroy of Egypt during his stay in London, thanking his Highness for the 'evidences of his determination to give effect to the great principles of religious freedom throughout the territories depending upon his authority.' The Conference would express an earnest hope that the principles of the Hatti Humayoun of 1856, for the protection of the subjects of the Turkish dominions, acting according to their religious convictions, may thus be carried out throughout the whole of that empire."

SYRIA.

M. Naville, of Geneva, moved, and Mr. Goe, of Louth, seconded, the following resolution, which was also carried unanimously :—

"Resolved—That it is a matter of sincere satisfaction to this Conference to find that the calamities which have taken place in Mount Lebanon are not unlikely to be overruled for the religious good of Syria and the Holy Land. The Committee of the Evangelical Alliance only did what was incumbent upon them when, on the subject of the Syrian massacres being brought before them on July 13, 1860, they adopted these following minutes: 'Resolved—That, while this Committee express their profound sense of the wrongs so flagrantly inflicted on the Syrian Christians, and earnestly desire to see British benevolence called into exercise in their favour, they are of opinion that this end is likely to be better attained if the object were taken up on the broad grounds of humanity, and, therefore, by public men generally, rather than by this Committee.' The Conference now understanding that the Syrian Relief Committee, having received several thousand pounds from Christian people in Sweden, Denmark, France, and Switzerland, for aiding Christian asylums in Syria, has generously handed over that amount to a purely Christian committee, who are taking steps to apply it in the best manner, and to make it the nucleus for an international fund for the benefit of Syria and the Holy Land. The effort has our best wishes, and we sincerely hope that Christian people of all classes and communities will feel it to be their duty to assist it."

THE LATE PRIMATE.

The Rev. W. M. Bunting (Wesleyan) moved the following resolution relating to his Grace the late Archbishop of Canterbury :—

"That this Conference cannot see so shining a light as that of the late excellent Archbishop of Canterbury withdrawn from the Church on earth without some expression and record of their affectionate veneration for his memory. In common with thousands of evangelical Christians of all communions, they desire to glorify God in the manifold gifts, graces, and good works of the departed prelate; in the sound learning so valuably applied to the illustration of Christian evidence, doctrine, and practice; in the blameless piety and benevolence of a lengthened life; in the abundant labours by which he sought, and with wide success, to spread the pure Gospel, and to multiply Gospel ministers in our own and in foreign lands. Associated for the special purposes of maintaining the integrity and the supremacy of essential Christian truth, and of cultivating and promoting the Christian temper, the members of the Evangelical Alliance could not but feel their spirits edified and their principles silently sustained by so eminent an example of the union of apostolic faithfulness with a saintly charity as that which the late Archbishop ever exhibited within the sphere of his own Church, and in peculiarly 'troubled times.' And, more especially, the unvarying frankness and kindness which marked his intercourse with his Nonconformist brethren on the platform of the Bible Society, and on other occasions—and the readiness with which he lent the influence of his name and station to more than one of the recent movements of united Christians of all nations in favour of religious liberty and of evangelical co-operation—endeared him to all good men of large and catholic spirit, and seems to render the present tribute to his memory a duty of gratitude. The Conference presume to offer to the bereaved family of his Grace the late Archbishop their united and most respectful condolence; and request their president to transmit to them a copy of this resolution, signed by the officers of the British Evangelical Alliance."

The Rev. Dr. Robson, of Glasgow (Presbyterian), seconded the motion, which was briefly but warmly supported by the Rev. Dr. Urwick, of Dublin (Independent), and the Hon. and Rev. Leland Noel (Episcopalian).

The Chairman stated that a meeting preliminary to the late conference at Geneva was held at the Palace at Lambeth, and the Archbishop called upon the Rev. Mr. Bunting to pray. At Eton, the boys were so struck with the sermons of the late prelate (then Mr. Sumner), that they addressed a round robin to him requesting him to publish them.

The resolution was agreed to, and prayer by the Rev. A. Fraser closed the proceedings.

PUBLIC MEETING.

On the evening of Thursday a public meeting was held in the large hall. The chair was taken at half-past six o'clock, by Lord Calthorpe.

The Chairman said he fully sympathised with the spirit and aim of the Evangelical Alliance. The more love and union prevailed among professing Christians, the more influence they would have upon the world. If the spirit of the Alliance were to prevail on the continent of America at the present moment, how different the aspect of affairs would soon become! The same might be said with regard to every other country; and therefore it was the bounden duty of every one to forward the movement by every means that lay in his power." He was glad to know that the society had extended its operations with partial success into France, Germany, and other countries. God grant that the whole world might soon be influenced by its spirit, and the different nations be led to love one another in the Gospel of Christ!

The Rev. Dr. Winslow said it was a cause for thankfulness that Christ did not leave any particular order of government in His Church. He had left it open for each individual to form his own judgment, as far as he could, guided by the unerring light of the revealed Word. But on one point our Lord left us to conjecture and invent nothing, and that one point was the essential unity of His Church in things absolutely essential to salvation, and the manifestations of that unity in the unity of spirit and in the bonds of peace. Why should he not hold perfect fellowship with his brethren who differed from him on Church government, on Church ordination? What was there to prevent co-operation in promoting the glory of their One Lord? He believed that many good men had held aloof from them under an idea that they were attempting to make a new unity of purpose in the ecclesiastical organization of the day. That, however, was a mistake.

The Rev. S. Minton said that the Evangelical Alliance was established to supply a want and remedy an evil. One of its objects was to bring Christians of different denominations and countries together. The evil which it was designed to remedy was the alienation which, to a great extent, existed between Christians of different denominations. That evil was threefold. It inflicted a great injury on the spiritual interests of every believer who was subject to its influence. It was also a source of weakness to the Church of Christ in its efforts to bring the Gospel to the great masses of people in this country and abroad. It also produced a bad moral effect upon the world around. It was not merely the existence of love, but the manifestation of it, which exerted an influence on others. To remedy this evil was worth all the efforts which the members of the Christian Church could put forth; and even if the effort were to fail he should consider himself honoured in having been one to make it. Judged of by the actual number of its members, the Alliance did not form a perfectly satisfactory protest against exclusiveness and disunion among Christians, but in the influence it exerted upon Christian people, even upon those who would not join it, it was of the highest importance. Mr. Minton concluded by answering some of the popular objections against the Alliance.

The Rev. Dr. Urwick said that there were two societies in which he felt an especial interest—the Bible Society and the Evangelical Alliance. The former of these societies was established for the dissemination of truth; the latter for the promotion of love. It was refreshing for Christians to meet with one another, even though they might not understand each other's language.

Dr. Kalopothakes, of Athens, said that a few years ago there was no union among the Protestants in Athens, but now there were stated united prayer-meetings and other indications of the growth of a spirit of love and unity amongst them, which had a very salutary influence on those who were opposed to them on religious grounds.

The Rev. T. R. Birks, having briefly reviewed the subjects which had been brought before the Conference, took up the question of Christian union with reference to the duty of the Church in the present day to a fallen world. One cause of the slow progress of Christianity was the unfaithfulness of the Church to the truth, and to the great and crowning grace of love, and the coldness, division, and separation existing among its members. The duty of spreading abroad the Gospel, and of Christian union, was clearly laid down in the Scriptures, especially in the closing passages of the last book of the Old Testament, the Four Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles. There were, however, great hindrances to the work of the Alliance, which would be felt in proportion to the increase of the field which they had to occupy; but their encouragement was in the words of Scripture spiritually applied to these times, "There be more with us than with them." Analogies might be drawn between the kingdoms of nature and of grace. The most wonderful inventions of modern times were the electric telegraph and photography, and these typified the work of the Gospel in bringing the ends of the world together, and in displaying the power of the Sun of Righteousness, in showing men their true characters, and in furnishing them with emblems of each other's love.

The Hon. and Rev. B. W. Noel said that no one could abstain from cultivating a spirit of love to his brethren without doing himself an injury. Christians should be very careful how they neglected any lawful means of promoting love and union. Union and godliness exerted a reciprocal influence one upon the other.

One of the chief and most immediate effects of the revivals in America, Ireland, and Wales was the promotion of union. On the other hand, the effort of believers to promote Christian love had a reflex influence upon their own minds and hearts, and caused them to grow in grace. The work of the Alliance would only be half done unless it induced Christians to seek after personal holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.

The Doxology was then sung, and the meeting separated.

The following were among the gentlemen present at the meetings: The Hon. and Revs. B. W. Noel and Leland Noel; the Revs. A. Barrett, Richmond; T. Curme, Vicar of Sandford; T. T. Churton, Rector of Shefford; R. Sewell, Londonderry; G. Curnock, Wolverhampton; Dr. Wilson, Limerick; J. Hill, Stratford; J. Trestrail, Greenwich; J. Towers, Birkenhead; A. M'Ewen, Dr. Robson, A. Literature.

The Revelation of Jesus Christ by John. Expounded by FRANCIS BODFIELD HOOPER, Rector of Upton Warren, in Worcestershire, Author of "A Guide to the Apocalypse," "Palmoui," &c. In two vols. Rivington.

Two volumes, of nearly eleven hundred pages, of rather small and close type, with new theories on almost every point of the much-vexed Apocalypse, may probably have charms for some readers. We confess to a feeling of desolate hopelessness and heart-numbing desperation at the very sight of it. N'importe, the author "goes in" for the work in a spirit of pluck which we cannot but consider imitable. We have here a new translation "on the principle of strict literality;" then an exposition on the principle, it would seem, of essential difference from all other schemes—"Præterist, Præsentist, or Futurist." In our eyes this, indeed, might be no deadly sin, if we could have a little clear and simple truth instead. Readers, however, must judge for themselves how far the former theories are demolished, and something better supplied. The "seven-sealed book" comes out of our author's hands a totally different affair from anything hitherto, that we know of, alleged concerning it. "The first six seals depict the history of the six ages between the creation and the second destruction of Jerusalem; the seventh seal marks off the sabbatical, millennial, or celestial age." If this cistern will hold water, the first and most obvious inference is, how pitiable has been the waste of learned and ingenious lucubration, from Brightman to Elliot, not to speak of the Futurist multitudes still darkly pondering the abyss of the mystery. Mr. Hooper tells us, indeed, that he does not intend "to fire a broadside into every wrecked vessel" he sees in his course; nevertheless, all other previous navigators on this sea are, according to him, hopelessly and visibly stranded; and are but warning beacons to direct him in his adventurous voyage. This assumed failure of all the others is very much grounded on the fact that solid divines and popular readers have adopted such very opposite and contradictory schemes, as the Præterist, the Præsentist, and the Futurist. "What more probable hypothesis can be made than that the wide and general diversities of opinion are due to the fact, that neither of the existing schools is in possession of the truth, even as to its main features?"

This logic is scarcely irreproachable; and the next new theorists could probably dispose of Mr. Hooper's "wrecked" hulk in a similar manner, without much difficulty. At least, all that we have yet understood is, that the various theories thus branded as old and useless wrecked hulks, are still respectively considered by self-complacent votaries and voyagers therein, as very respectable seaworthy ships, going gallantly on down the stream of time. It is only the opposite theories which by opposing theorists are respectively upbraided as rather leaky, to say the least. Mr. Hooper's objections to all the said schemes are undoubtedly very sonorous, look very formidable, and may be equally forcible. Nor have we any thoroughly implicit faith in any of them; while to much in each of them we could decidedly object. It is, however, somewhat too dull a task to enter upon the subject as now propounded. The accumulated rubbish to be removed is almost boundless; the existing state of prejudice is almost hopeless; and, in any case, something more clear, decisive, and irrefragable than seems generally in these volumes advanced will, we think, be requisite to remove the erroneous or doubtful, and establish the true hypotheses. Much astonishing ingenuity has, for instance, been exhibited in respect of the "Three unclean spirits like frogs" (Rev. xvi. 13, 14), by divers interpreters, as is well known. Mr. Hooper makes out these three unclean spirits to be the three bodily men, Otho, Galba, and Vitellius, and seems to think that this can be determined so "readily," and also "satisfactorily." Unclean beasts, no doubt, the said emperors were; but for the resolution of this, and many somewhat similar enigmas after Mr. Hooper's manner, we shall only now observe, in Hudibrastic phrase:—

There needs no more be said here;
We unto him refer the reader.

The Heavenward Path; or, Progress and Perfection in the Life of Faith. By the Rev. WILLIAM WILSON, M.A., &c., &c. Edinburgh: W. Nimmo.

THE title of this little work partly tells its own tale. It is a practical commentary, however, on the Second Epistle of Peter, or rather more especially on the eleven first verses of the first chapter; though some notice is taken of the remaining portions of the epistle, as bearing on the chief topic—growth in holiness. Ware not aware that in the present day any unduly preponderating stress is laid upon Faith, irrespectively of the character and conduct which are true faith's necessary products. Practically, indeed, those results of faith may be now, as they ever have been, insufficiently demonstrated; but perhaps not less now than aforetime. The volume before us is an average set of discourses on the subject.

Freedom and Happiness in the Truth and Ways of Christ. Sermons by the Rev. JAMES STRATTON, more than forty years Minister of Paddington Chapel. London: Nisbet and Co.

THIS is a very delightful book, replete with sound, manly, sunny religious truth. Nobody, we might almost say, can read it without benefit and blessing; but certainly it is well calculated to convey, or stimulate, and strengthen, and increase, that glorious liberty and happiness of God's children which is its theme. The book, too, is printed in a bold and clear type and a convenient form, which make still more pleasant the act of perusing its precious contents.

The Works of John Howe, M.A. Vols. II. and III. London: The Religious Tract Society.

WHATEVER may be, in some respects, the issues of the Bicentenary movement, the lessons of the past will have been egregiously misread, if they fail to counteract the admitted tendency, in certain quarters, to doctrinal degeneracy. The ecclesiastical controversies in which the later Puritans and the early Non-conformists engaged have secured their full share of attention; let us now hope that their sterling theology and masculine treatises on practical religion will not be overlooked. As one means to this end, the republication of Howe's works, by the Religious Tract Society, must be regarded as most opportune. Nor is this the only merit of the edition before us. The utmost care has been taken in securing the accuracy of the text, and no little pains has been expended, by punctuation and otherwise, in rendering it perspicuous where, otherwise, it would be obscure. This, to Professor Rogers—a more competent editor than whom it would probably have been impossible to find—was doubtless a labour of love. Of the volumes before us, the second comprises the treatises on "Delighting in God," "The Redeemer's Tears Wept over Lost Souls," and "The Redeemer's Dominion over the Invisible World." The third volume contains the work which has made the name of Howe immortal—"The Living Temple." Though exceedingly well got up, these volumes are very cheap.

The Sympathy of Christ with Man: its Teaching and its Consolation. By OCTAVIUS WINSLOW, D.D. London: Nisbet and Co.

DR. WINSLOW tells us that "one and the chief design of this volume is to exhibit and illustrate the practical character of our Lord's emotional nature." This looks a little turgid or obscure, but means, we presume, that our Lord's emotions led to the active exercise of power for the relief of the sufferers with whom He sympathised, or to some other special activity beyond mere feeling. The theme is one capable of much enlargement of varied illustration; and such a writer as Dr. Winslow could not fail to convey both instruction and comfort on such a topic. There are some things, however, in this little volume with which we cannot quite agree; and some which appear to exhibit the system of the writer's school of thought as repressing the larger outgoings of his own sympathies. But we have not time or space to criticise.

Nichol's Puritan Divines. The Complete Works of RICHARD SIBBES, D.D., &c. Vol. III. Containing Commentary on the First Chapter of the Second Epistle to the Corinthians. Edinburgh: James Nichol.

WE have already noticed the two former volumes of the works of Dr. Sibbes, as appearing in the Puritan series of "Nichol's Standard Divines." This third volume is exclusively taken up with one treatise—viz., a commentary on 2 Cor. i.; which we are told was published in a handsome folio volume by Dr. Manton after the author's death, being the substance of many sermons formerly preached at Gray's-inn. Dr. Manton's short preface is characteristic and brilliant, and the work itself an ordinary specimen of the Puritan teaching and style.

Monthly Retrospect.

HOME.

A STRANGE and portentous thing has happened in the Church of England—a bishop has turned infidel. We use the word in its old, broad meaning; for, so far as we are aware, the rejection of the Divine authority of the Pentateuch by Bishop Colenso is as complete as it ever was in the case of Hume or Gibbon. He has written a volume to prove that “the last four books of the Pentateuch must be pronounced to be fictitious;” whence he argues that the Book of Genesis must be, in the main, fictitious also. The volume, we ought to add, is not yet published; and, in ordinary cases, it would have been but courteous to wait till the publication had taken place, before pronouncing censure; but the Bishop, or his friends, have rendered this unnecessary, as they have taken the trouble to circulate copies in private, as if challenging, or at least courting, judgment. It is now some six or seven years since Dr. Colenso was consecrated the first Bishop of Natal by the late Archbishop of Canterbury. At the time, there were protests against the unsoundness of his opinions—protests which the Bishop justified by his commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, which was reviewed in our last number. But in the forthcoming volume he appears to have thrown down the gauntlet against Christians of all denominations, and to have taken his place among the infidel ranks; for we need not, we are sure, remind our readers how Christianity rests upon and germinates out of the religious system and history contained in the Mosaic record. That he still holds by a belief in Christ, may be true; but it can hardly be the Christ of whom “Moses in the Law and the Prophets did write.” The forthcoming volume is a more audacious assault on the Christian foundations than the notorious “Essays and Reviews;” both because the attack is more open and direct, and because of the more elevated position of the assailant. So high is he, indeed, that there seems to be some doubt how the Church is to deal with him. It never seems to have entered the minds of the many authors of Church Discipline Acts that they might have to proceed against a bishop. We are not without hope, however, that Bishop Colenso will spare all trouble on that head by his resignation. Why, even a member of Parliament resigns when his opinions cease to be in accord with his constituents’. The Bishop may not care to be a Christian; but, at any rate, he should act like an honourable man of the world.

Her Majesty has returned from her lengthened sojourn on the Continent: we rejoice to believe in renewed health and spirits. Her return has been somewhat delayed by the recent gales which have raged in the Channel, and which, we regret to say, have produced disastrous results to life and property in our mercantile marine. Now that Her Majesty has returned to her own dominions, we may hope that the episcopal arrangements which have been for some time in abeyance will be forthwith completed. The Dean and Chapter of Canterbury have received the usual Royal permission to elect an Archbishop to the vacant Primacy, with the accompanying recommendation of Archbishop Longley, of York, to the office. The see of York went for some time a begging; the Bishop of London and the Bishop of Winchester successively refused it; but it is now understood that Lord Auckland, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, has accepted it. We must wait till we hear who is to succeed Lord Auckland in his Western see before we can ascertain the full effect of these changes. So far as they have gone, they have been satisfactory; or rather, it would be more correct to say, they have elicited no complaint. Dr. Longley is reported to be a man of moderate opinions, but with a tendency to High Church leanings, of which the permission for the York Convocation to meet and deliberate, first given by him, may be taken as an earnest. Of his successor, Lord Auckland, much the same thing may be said, with the exception that his views on Church questions are not even so pronounced as those of Archbishop Longley. The praise to be awarded to both is of a negative character; they have conducted the affairs of their dioceses for many years without once provoking scandal or causing irritation; they have not been noisy or fussy bishops, and no one has accused them of indolence or indifference.

The sixteenth annual Conference of the British Organization of the Evangelical Alliance was held, in the course of last month, in London. The meetings were full of interest, and dealt in succession with some of the questions which most profoundly agitate the world at the present time. From their importance, we have thought it right to give a full report of the proceedings, and therefore we need not do more here than refer to the more salient features of the Conference. Sir Culling Eardley, who has served the Alliance—how unweariedly, zealously, ably and successfully, we need not here say—ever since its commencement, sixteen years ago, in the capacity of Chairman of Council, has been compelled, from the state of his health, to retire from that arduous post, and was unanimously elected to the more honourable and less laborious office of President of the British Branch of the Alliance. Reference was made very early in the proceedings to the late Conference at Geneva; and we rejoice to learn from a paper written by M. Lombard, of Geneva, and read at the meeting, which we give in another column, that the visit of the Alliance to that interesting city has issued in the practical good of effecting, to some extent, the better observance of the Lord's-day. An animated discussion took place on the subject of the unfortunate American quarrel. While the North had its warm friends, the South also found some apologists; the Alliance, in this respect, reflecting the opinions of the country at large. Many interesting addresses were delivered; the most interesting of all being by the Rev. Dr. Macfarlane, of the United Presbyterian Church, who has recently settled in London, and whose beautiful church, in the neighbourhood of Clapham, is about to be opened as we go to press. We congratulate, not the Alliance only, but the churches of London, on having their ranks in the metropolis strengthened by the settlement among them of such an able minister.

The Congregationalists held their Autumnal Conference in the course of last month in the metropolis. The chair was occupied by the Rev. Samuel Martin, who opened the Conference by a splendid address on the present aspect of the Church and the world. The periodical meetings of this body, we need not add here, have no authority, but they must necessarily exercise a large amount of influence on their congregations. The Bicentenary, of course, occupied a large share of the attention of the Conference. The sum subscribed was reported to be upwards of 120,000*l.*, and the fountain of liberality is not yet exhausted. In addition to that, there has been a large increase of chapel enlargement and chapel building within the last few years. Among the acquisitions of the Congregational Chapel Building Society, we are glad to find that Whitefield's old Tabernacle, in Tottenham Court-road, has fallen into their hands, and thus been saved from parties that would have put it to ignoble purposes. In spite of some rumours to the contrary, the meeting passed over in general harmony and peace. The only incident that occurred to ruffle the surface of their peace was a discussion on that vexed question of the American war. A Mr. Woodrup has come over from the Northern States, and begged the Congregational Union to appoint a jury that should examine into the whole evidence, and pronounce authoritatively on the merits of the quarrel. The Conference declined the flattering, but perilous honour, and the debate that occurred showed how heated are the passions of men, even on this side of the Atlantic, on this subject, and consequently how unfitted they are to judge calmly of the state of the question. With this trifling exception, the harmony of the meeting, through its several sittings, was undisturbed.

It has always been understood that the right of free discussion was sacred in England. That right, however, has of late been impugned, not by the strong hand of power, but by the violence of mob law. A meeting was called of the London populace, to be held in Hyde-park, on Sunday, the 5th of October, to express sympathy with Garibaldi. The Irish Romanists attended in large numbers, and apparently under organised leaders, who riotously broke up the assembly, assaulted the speakers, and threw the park for the rest of the day into uproar and confusion. On the following Sunday the outrages were worse; the number of the rioters was increased, and the riot, disorder, and scandal were immensely greater than before. The police authorities, who could hardly be said to have acted, in the first instance, with sufficient promptitude, have now prevented all speaking in the parks whatever, and the license, which practice had gone far to sanction, of preaching in these places of summer resort, has been expressly withdrawn. It is not necessary for us to record our condemnation of Sunday political meetings; the offence of which, in the recent instance, is scarcely aggravated in our eyes by the fact that the meeting, though professedly political, was really infidel, as may be inferred from the fact that one of the principal speakers was an infidel lecturer, who has acquired an unhappy notoriety under the name of "Iconoclast." But the mingled wickedness and folly of one class of the community is no excuse for the unmitigated wickedness of another class, who defy authority, break the Queen's peace, and, armed with stones and bludgeons, make a murderous onslaught on the citizens, to the watchword of "Up with the Pope, down with Garibaldi!" Or if the Sunday demonstration be held as some palliation for these ruffians in London, what is to be said for the conduct of their countrymen in Birkenhead, where a mob equally furious, and in this case led on by Romish priests, made an attack upon a harmless debating club, that met on a Wednesday evening in a quiet schoolroom, to discuss the question whether or no the conduct of Garibaldi deserved approbation? Here a large portion of the town was for some time in possession of the mob, while a Roman Catholic priest, named Brundrit, a pervert from the English Church, appears from his own confession to have been actively engaged in hounding them on. His conduct, indeed, is not singular; Sir George Bowyer writes to the Times, approving of the spirit and pluck displayed by the Irish in Hyde-park; while Cardinal Wiseman and Dr. Grant, of Southwark, issue pastorals, in which, while they dissuade the flocks from violence, they significantly hint that their opponents are the aggressors, and that the forbearance of the Papists is only to be purchased by the suppression of free discussion. Such advice might be quite correct in Spain, but it has not yet come to this in free England.

FOREIGN.

Europe is at this moment the theatre of two mighty antagonistic forces, organised authority, and individual opinion—and the prize of the victor is Rome. The feeble old man that there retains his seat has yet agencies and resources at his beck which it will not do for Protestants to under-estimate. It appeared but a short time ago as if he were about to be despoiled of his place and power, and his goods given to another; but within these few weeks we have witnessed another change in the political world—a reactionary movement in the will of the man that is at present master of the situation; and a change in his councils, favourable to the Pope, comes to check our impatience, and reminds us that the end we had so fondly hoped is not yet. The change is the more remarkable, as it was only a few weeks before, that the French official journal published a remarkable letter from the Emperor, setting forth his desire to assist the Pope, and the impossibility of his doing so unless his Holiness would consent to certain arrangements; to all which the Pope returned a flat refusal. It was thought that Louis Napoleon would never have published such an affront to his authority unless he meant to resent it. It now appears that the Pope had calculated his position better than the Emperor: it is the monarch who recedes; the Pontiff maintains his dignity. Explanations have, no doubt, been put forward to prove that the French policy is still unchanged; but these avail little in the face of the fact that the Minister who published the letter is dismissed, apparently for its publication, and is replaced by another, whose distinctive public policy is that the Pope ought to be supported at Rome by French troops. There is a certain air of imposing and mysterious grandeur in this position of the Pope, so apparently helpless, yet so really strong; safe, though surrounded with enemies; conceding nothing, yet overcoming everything. We do not wonder at the triumph which the Romanists claim for their master and their cause. And yet we think we can discern in this incident only a momentary check—that sort of transitory triumph which is often permitted to a bad cause, to harden the hearts of its supporters, and lure them on the more certainly to their own destruction. From the letter of our Italian correspondent it will be seen how varied and how effective are the various evangelical influences at work in the country. The Pope stands still; but the world moves.

If we wanted an instance of the unchangeable intolerance of the Romish system, we should find it in what is happening in Spain. It sounds so like an absurdity, in this latter half of the nineteenth century, that men should be deprived of their liberty for reading the Bible, that even French journalists are unable to realise the fact, and loudly protest against the anachronism. But it is not the less true. The case of Matamoros and his associates, which has so long excited the sympathies and awakened the prayers of all English Protestants, has been brought before the Superior Tribunal of Granada; and while some of the minor offenders have been discharged, Alhama has been condemned to nine years' imprisonment, and Matamoros to eight years'; and both are for ever interdicted from following the office of a teacher. It is probable that the able Minister who is now at the head of Spanish affairs sees the enormity of these sentences much as we see them ourselves; but, with a bigoted population, and a sovereign divided between the priests and her pleasures, he is not likely to risk his own power by interference on their behalf; so little else can be done for the poor sufferers but commend them to God. If it is any consolation to them to know that, not Protestants only, but civilised Europe, cries shame on their treatment; that, in their persecution, the Papacy is inflicting moral suicide on itself—that consolation they may surely enjoy.

It is a curious circumstance, that while the authenticity of the Pentateuch is questioned in England, the genuineness of the Gospels is attacked in France. It will be seen from our correspondent's letter that M. Renan has addressed a letter to one of the French newspapers, in which he endeavours to show that the Gospels of the four Evangelists are a mere bundle of legends, myths and traditionary sayings, with a slight residuum of historical truth. Of course, there is nothing here which has not been said by other infidels over and over again; and yet somehow the Gospels preserve their vitality. So it is still; for our correspondent, while narrating this fresh attack on Christianity, adds various cheering accounts of the progress of pure and undefiled religion in various districts in France.

An unfortunate dispute has occurred in Prussia between the King and the Chamber of Deputies with respect to the expense of the army. The Chamber claims the right, as a constitutional power, of controlling the amount of money to be voted for the purpose; while the King insists that the exclusive management of the army is a part of his prerogative, on which the Chamber may advise, but must not control. The Upper Chamber has taken part with the King; and the Crown Prince, who is understood to have advised conciliatory measures, has gone on a foreign tour, finding his advice rejected. On religious no less than on political grounds these disputes are to be deplored. A portion of the Prussian clergy strongly side with the King, as we observe, from the letter of our German correspondent, that the Prussian members of the Kirchentag, lately held at Brandenburg, expressed a warm approval of the course adopted by the King. A more pleasant, as well as profitable, subject on which the members of that union were engaged, was the discussion of the question how far the Church in Germany can be trusted to manage its own affairs, without altogether depriving the civil power of its present rights.

As we are going to press, intelligence arrives in this country that an insurrection has broken out in Greece; that the King has been deposed, or, at least, has abdicated; and that the Provisional Government has passed a resolution declaring his dynasty at an end. We note the fact, without attempting now to calculate the issues. It is impossible to over-estimate the importance of this movement, not in the kingdom of Greece alone, but upon Europe, and still more upon the state of society and religion in the East. We can hardly doubt that the agitation will communicate itself to the Christian provinces of Turkey, and that a new chapter in God's dealings with these old homes of the Christian faith is about to be opened up.

The news from America continues to be of the same afflictive and indecisive character as ever. We hear of battles in various states, but they are fruitful only in blood; and there seems no disposition in either party to end the strife. The religious papers of New York show great irritation towards England, thinking that we ought to exhibit more sympathy for their cause than we have done. Of course, they do not see their own faults as those strike us. The proclamation of the President, that, after next New Year's-day, the slaves of all men then in rebellion shall be free, has as yet produced no practical effect, beyond that of increased bitterness on the side of the South. The President's own scheme, for removing the negroes to some point in Central America, has been abandoned; the independent states in Central America having protested against the arrangement.

We are glad to learn that the statement made last month, upon the authority of some of the daily papers, as to the illness of the Rev. John Smith Moffat, is incorrect, and that at the date of his last letters he was enjoying good health.

"The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of horrid cruelty." The full meaning of the Psalmist's words have seldom been more vividly realised in modern days than by the letter which Captain Perry, of Her Majesty's ship Griffin, has sent to the Church Missionary Society respecting the atrocities committed at Dahomey. In August last Captain Perry had a communication with Mr. Euschart, a Dutchman residing on the coast, but who had been up to Dahomey, had had an interview with the King, and had witnessed many human sacrifices. Among the victims was a man named William Doherty—an African indeed, but from Sierra Leone, and probably a liege subject of Her Majesty. At all events, he was a Christian man, employed as a missionary and catechist at Ishagga, where he had been captured, with others, in a raid that the Dahomey chief had made upon that town. We have no doubt the murder of this good man will attract the notice of our Foreign-office; and all England will rejoice if this atrocity gives us the right to interfere. The sacrifices which this Dutch trader reports, horrible as they are in themselves, were, however, only regarded as preliminary to an invasion on a more extended scale which the King meditated on the Christian station of Abeokuta. It was openly declared that this invasion would take place in November; so that if our countrymen in the neighbourhood have not interfered, or help arisen, by God's Providence, in some other way, it is probable that as our readers peruse these pages that bright centre of Christian light may be quenched in smoke and blood, and reduced to the condition of the surrounding darkness. May God in His mercy avert this great calamity!

BISHOP COLENZO AND THE PENTATEUCH.*

IN a popular, but sufficiently accurate way, it may be said that "Heresy" is the denial or depraved perversion of some fundamental or very important article of the Catholic creed of the Church of Christ, while "Infidelity" denies or subverts the foundation of the Church itself. The former admits Revelation, and acknowledges the greater amount of its teaching (as generally received), while denying or corrupting some essential tenet. The latter lays the axe to the root of Revealed Religion, if not also of Natural Religion; and does not trouble itself to pervert the doctrines which it rejects radically. Bishop Colenso's present production, however, would be inadequately designated as either only infidel or only heretical. It is composite. He comes before us as a monstrosity; a sort of theological Centaur, where the heretical man is mounted on the infidel quadruped. His book is virtually and viciously infidel. But as he is a bishop, and intends to remain a bishop, it is a necessity of his position to be a theological infidel. A new mitred edition, with notes and illustrations of Volney and Tom Paine, or even of Lords Bolingbroke and Shaftesbury, would scarcely answer in our day. The religious element in man's nature, the deep-seated principle or instinct implanted in us by the Author of our being, the ineradicable logic of the human intellect, the irrepressible yearning of the human affections after God—have already proved too strong against all those brilliant and powerful masters of learning, logic, eloquence, and wit, who laboured so mightily, but so vainly, to conquer and destroy them. SIN—wilful, unrepented, persevering SIN—is your only real necromancer, with power to eject God and hope from the soul, which the God of Hope has formed to rejoice in hope and in God. Blank, black Atheism, and cold, cheerless Deism, have accordingly, from time to time, been weighed in the balance, found wanting, and rejected by mankind at large; and if "the evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God," have proceeded (in individuals) to such heights of wickedness, those instances themselves do but powerfully corroborate the wisdom of the wise, who have always consented, in harmony with all experience, to place individual, and family and social, and national and universal happiness and prosperity, upon the only foundation that can sustain so valuable and tremendous a fabric, which is (whether you call it virtue, or duty, or religion) the obedience of man in heart and mind, in belief and conduct, to the revealed will of the one true and only God. Atheism may nullify God's existence; Pantheism may nullify His personality and moral perfections; Deism, admitting His existence, may deny the revelation of Himself and of His will, which we assert that He has made; but all who "profess and call themselves Christians" believe or admit these foundation verities, and something more. And the Church of Christ, in all ages and everywhere, has exacted, and exacts, with more or less amplitude or stringency, from every member, and more specifically from every minister, an adhesion which is supposed to be truthfully given, not merely to the great facts of Natural and Revealed Religion, but to a considerable body of doctrines selected as important, if not indispensable, out of a book whose Divine authority has never been questioned, or permitted to be questioned, within the Church's pale.

When, therefore, any enemy of our religion commences an attack, we ascertain his principles, and proceed accordingly. Infidelity, of whatever shape, has to be dealt with in one fashion; heresy, of whatever tinge, in another. We disprove heresy out of the Sacred Scriptures. We disprove infidelity by establishing the Sacred Scriptures. We do not insult the infidel when we give him the appellation in which he glories. We should be ungenerous were we to stigmatise the mere heretic as an infidel, since he professes to believe the sacred record of the faith, while he disputes the character of its contents against the Church catholic. But how are we to deal with Bishop Colenso? We must do him the justice to say that, however palpable the tendency and logical results of dethroning the Sacred Scriptures from their supremacy may be to other minds, he does not yet recognise such results. He would not leave us in the dreary darkness of Atheism. He asserts a God. He even asserts a Divine authority for the Sacred Scriptures, after depriving them of all real title to acceptance as sacred, by any reflecting person. He conceives that the God who cannot lie did yet specially inspire, to deliver great truths, men who "lied with circumstance" while uttering these truths of God. Moses (or "somebody"), for instance, tells us that he is writing a history in the Book of Exodus; and in writing that history he tells us, amongst other matters (chaps. iii. and vi.), that the Eternal God revealed Himself by name, and in a remarkable manner, to Moses. This witness is surely either true or false? A believing Christian would say the historian was a true man, writing a true history. A scoffing infidel, on the other hand, would say the whole was an old wife's fable. Bishop Colenso says it is both! The man (whether Moses or whoever else) was indeed specially inspired, "first to conceive himself this transcendent divine thought, and then to express and tell it forth to others. To him first, in the secrets of his own inner being, was the revelation made of the nature and character of the supreme self-existent Being; and then he was moved by the selfsame spirit, and empowered with strength from above, to declare that Name as an object of faith to us." How do you know this, Bishop Colenso? Where were you when you learned this wonderful fact? You don't find it in the Book of Exodus, nor in the New Testament, where reference is made to Exodus and the "story of the bush." But you do find Moses (or whoever was that historian, "somebody") solemnly declaring, as a matter of fact, not that somebody had strength to conceive in his "inner being," but that Moses had outward, and visible, and palpable, and audible communications then and there, which, as matters of fact, the historian recorded, and which, as such matters of true fact, are referred to by our Lord Jesus Christ Himself in the Gospel; and elsewhere in the New Testament by others. We decline, therefore, to accept Bishop Colenso's figment, that the holy man of old was at once so holy, as to be inspired of God with the sublimest of revelations, and so unscrupulous a fabricator of falsehood, as to palm upon us, for true historic fact, the third and sixth chapters of Exodus, which Colenso declares to be fabulous, or "unhistorical!" The fit parallel for such a conception is the position of Colenso himself. Ordained deacon, priest, and bishop in the Church of England, bound by more than triple obligations to that Church, he writes this book, assumes the noble attitude of a confessor for God, and prospectively of a martyr for truth itself, and yet asserts at once his right to retain his ecclesiastical status, and his liberty to subvert that status, as the apostle of an entirely new religion. We marvel as we read. Over and over again have we pondered the words of his preface and the statements of his book, with deepening amazement and kindling indignation at the audacity of his onslaught—not upon the Bible, but upon our common sense, and our ineradicable sentiments of the honest, the honourable, the upright, and the true. When white shall have become black—when round shall have become square—when the same fountain shall send forth sweet waters and bitter at once—then shall these notions be tolerable, that Moses, fabricating a downright falsehood, was a holy and inspired man; and that Colenso, a bishop of England's Church, is permitted, as such bishop, nay, is justified as such bishop, nay, is more cogently urged by being such bishop, in duty and conscience to God and to truth, to eradicate man's belief in the veracity of the Bible, in order to prevent the ruin of man's faith in something which (with "Divine authority") that Bible, being a patently and a palpably stupid, impossible, unhistorical, unvaracious, fabrication and compilation, does yet, he alleges, contain!

The sophistry by which the Divine inspiration of Moses (or somebody) is harmonised with his palming stupid and impossible falsehoods upon us as true facts, is very similar to the sophistry by which Colenso harmonises his own book and conduct with his clerical and episcopal obligations. Something called an "essential principle," or "main substance," is set up, which, as a Pope, dispenses with all common morality. The Church of England, Colenso tells us, is based (not upon Bible, or Prayer-book, or both, but) upon what Colenso thinks "the truth itself." As bishop of the Church of England, he has no doubt voluntarily undertaken certain obligations. But as bishop of "the truth itself," he has prior and higher obligations. Common men would think it better to renounce the one, and cleave to the other; but Colenso can serve both God and Mammon. As bishop of the truth, he tells us (sect. 179) he would have had no religious scruples about ordaining a certain native, "without requiring him to enter on his ministerial course by uttering a falsehood." We should think so. But certain "other persons" about the Bishop had scruples. They considered the lie preliminary to be legally necessary and obligatory upon the bishop of England's Church. So he deferred to their scruples, and did not exact the lie, and did not ordain. We ask in amazement, does he ever ordain? Or when, as bishop of England's Church, he is requiring the future minister of God's truth to utter the preliminary falsehood, into what inner nook has he stowed away the prior and higher obligations of the bishop of "the truth itself?" The two bishoprics thus do not hang very well together. Nor do we think that the man who wears both mitres is likely to establish the special inspiration of "holy men of old," who are palpably devoid of common honesty and veracity; nor the "Divine authority" of the main essence of those Holy Scriptures, which, as Colenso asserts, are yet a rubbishy mass of contradictions, stupid fabrications, and impossibilities. No defendant of the Pentateuch or of the Bible, that we know of, has ever shrunk from admitting or asserting, that if, by such arguments as Colenso's (which are no novelties), it could be substantiated that the historic statements of the Bible are generally incredible, Revealed Religion must be given up, and possibly a great part of Natural Religion with it. Bishop Butler, quoted by Colenso, seems to admit so much. Hengstenberg, also quoted by him, fearlessly puts forth that thesis plainly; and in the following extract from a recent valuable production of Mr. Birks the same issue is substantially accepted:—

This character of the Bible is most favourable to the detection of its falsehood, or to the establishment of its truth. It multiplies greatly the tests which separate faithful testimony from the impostures of fraud, and the mere illusions of fancy. Unreal history is too sandy a foundation on which to rear, with the least hope of success, a temple of pure and everlasting truth. Sincere and honest narratives, though slightly discordant, or imperfect in a few minor details, might certainly be the means of conveying to us Divine messages of the highest worth and authority. But it is incredible that histories legendary and deceptive in their broad outlines, which would be condemned in all other cases as dishonest or worthless, should be the stem on which are found to grow the blossoms and richest fruitage of heavenly wisdom. Men do not gather grapes of thorns, nor figs of thistles. A pure morality and theology can never be the fruit of dishonest and deceptive history. Once let the conviction spread that whole books of the Bible, and main portions of its narratives, are gross, strange, and monstrous distortions of the real facts, or else mere legends, containing no real facts whatever, and Christianity will have received a fatal death-wound in the minds of educated and thoughtful men.—(The Bible and Modern Thought, second edition, p. 87.)

Such "death-wound to Christianity" is the necessary, if not the intentional, object of Colenso's book. Avowed infidels, accordingly, accept the position, and plainly tell us to put away our Bible, with Vedas and Koran, in our libraries, as a literary curiosity. And with sure instinct, also, the Church of God will reject Colenso himself, not merely as an heretical dissentient, but as an infidel assailant. He may talk of "a message from God to our souls" in his pages; of the "special inspiration" of some of its writers, in respect of special truths; and of the "Divine authority" which the Bible thus acquires. But when he tells us of "Sikh Goroos" who have been also thus specially inspired; and of other Orientals, who "had no Bible or Pentateuch to teach them, but who did surely learn, by the direct teaching of the Spirit of God," that page of "essential truth" with which he triumphantly crowns his volume, the authority and inspiration of our Holy Bible become wonderfully minimised indeed. And if anything can add to the contemptuous indignation due to the audacious and flimsy sciolism of this episcopal production, it is the statement made by its author, that the discoveries now—in hot haste—vouchsafed to us have not had a two years' old development in his own mind. Less than two years to mature the overthrow of the faith of every existing Church of Christ on earth! Less than two years to grasp conclusions which evacuate Butler, and Paley, and Lealie, and Lardner, and all ancient and modern theology. Had he proposed to modify some extravagant theory of mechanical verbal inspiration, by showing its difficulties, there was room for the attempt within the pale of the Church. Had he verged on heresy in some exegetical labours on the Pentateuch, like those on Romans, he might have been warningly (if perchance too leniently) reproved. To write such a book as Dr. Davidson's is evidently beyond the scope of his learning, and would not have been decent in a Christian bishop, bound by the Thirty-nine Articles. Yet even had he written such a book, for few and learned hands, he might have been quietly refuted. But he has done nothing of all these. He has put out a popular tractate, not for the learned, but for the reading multitude, paraded in all book-shops and upon all railway stalls, and filled with a spirit of animosity against the veracity of the Bible, as palpable as that of Tom Paine, and all the more mischievous because—instead of the vulgar virulence of that age and writer—we have blasphemy as yet veiled in a mist of neo-religious sentiment.

What the amount of that new religion, or "main essence" of the Bible, which Colenso proposes to give to mankind, to fill the "aching void" which he admits will be the result of the reception of his teaching on the non-veracity of the Bible, is not clear. So far as we can gather, it is not unlike the doctrine of Pope's universal prayer. He directs us to one Father, a good God of love, to whom all may have access, and from whom all may receive inspiration. This inspiration, when reduced to writing, would seem to possess "Divine authority," as being essential truth; and it is to be found thus, we presume, amongst "Sikh Goroos," and many others, "who have no Bible or Pentateuch to teach them." Boodha, Confucius, Mahomet, and Joe Smith, with his Book of Mormon, would thus be without difficulty established as true prophets of God; and their writings so far forth of "Divine authority" as this "main essence" is concerned. In effect, some instinct, power, or faculty, or communicated energy in the soul of man, so far as appears, must be sole judge of the Divine authority of this main essence of truth, whether in the Bible, or wherever else it is to be found. Philosophers have disputed whether or not the idea of God be innate in man; and some modern as well as ancient Pantheists have asserted the presence of man in God and God in man universally, without much profitable result. And before two years more have elapsed it is possible Colenso may discover that the difficulties of his system are ineffably greater and more fearful in their results than all the well-known and long-admitted difficulties of revelation, which he seems for the first time now to have stumbled upon; and with the aid of a few months' study of a few German writers to have decided against the Bible and the Church, and in favour of the infidel. Two years ago, when he wrote his book on Romans, he tells us he had no idea of his present work. Two years hence where will he be? We shall wait and see.

Meantime, as to the difficulty of harmonising Scripture, in the instances which he adduces, much, no doubt, will be written. Some of those instances are founded in the views he takes of the text, which will not be admitted to be correct. Some appear to betray a palpable ignorance of Hebrew. Some admit of various solutions. Most of them are handled by the majority of commentators one way or other, and are no novelties. Some may be candidly admitted as incapable of perfectly satisfactory explanation at present. But with all this have serious students of theology been long familiar; the only novelty is, that a Christian bishop should have raked together these various matters, and thus crudely propounded them, after slender consideration, as a conclusive proof that the historic Bible is an impudent and stupid and self-evidently convicted fabrication, and therefore to be demolished at all cost in the interests of truth, of man, and of God.

A distinguished German theologian, lately over in England, used to say, "The mole is among you, and you must be awake." That little animal, working in the dark, whose presence is known by its cast up dirt-heaps, may have hitherto illustrated our position. But the theological mole seems now to have come up to the light. The controversy is now broadly opened over the whole area of Christian doctrine, and the axe is laid to the root of Revealed, if not of Natural Religion also. As carnal warfare, with all its horrors, stimulates and exercises the energies of a nation, the spiritual warfare now upon us will, we doubt not, reinvigorate the Church of Christ. The principal weapons needed are faith, general learning, and a masterly acquaintance with the Shemitic tongues, and with the philosophy of the human mind in relation to the formation and growth of language. We put first FAITH. Long since has it been demonstrated that the Bible cannot be handled in sceptical or nonbelieving fashion, like any other book. If this were admissible it must be primâ facie rejected, just as we at once reject the prodigies of Livy or the monstrous fables of the Eastern mythology. But quite apart from its internal character of sublime divinity and pure morality, and its experienced power to purify the soul and regenerate nations, the Bible comes to us authenticated for Divine by evidence which has convinced the reason and commanded the assent of powerful intellects in every age. Its contents, therefore, are trustworthy; its precepts, therefore, command our obedience; and its revelations demand our reverence. And before we can renounce our faith and obedience and reverence for the exclusively Divine character and authority of the Bible, the force of that evidence must be overthrown. The knowledge, accordingly, of the history of the controversy, and the arguments concerning that evidence, is of high importance once more. But a somewhat new element is now introduced into this warfare which demands recognition. Infidel philologists of vast learning have assailed the Pentateuch and Bible on the ground of arguments derived from the growth and decay of languages. In this matter "a little learning is a dangerous thing." But we are convinced that a perfect mastery of the Shemitic tongues, and a thorough knowledge of the philosophy in this relation of the human mind, would result in the demolition of these far-fetched arguments. Nevertheless, it will not do to be nibbling and sciolising in this department, and we confess we should be glad to see immediate and efficient steps adopted in our universities and elsewhere for the encouragement of good schools of Shemitic learning and comparative philology. For although Colenso's book be entirely despicable on this score, we doubt not that others of larger acquirements will soon follow in his wake, and dazzle the uninitiated by a show of that scholarship which silences argument, except when advanced by equal or superior antagonists.

The present attempt, however, is not addressed to the profound or learned, but to the superficial multitude. And as its object and result is to shake their faith, our primary duty is not to fritter away at details, but to enforce the general argument. We pass by all controversy about the larger Natal volume, of which this book is an excerpt, slightly amended. We pass by also all the paltry quibbling about the words "unhistorical" and "fictitious." We think the Record was perfectly justified in treating the Natal volume as sufficiently published to be the proper subject of criticism. And, since the veracity of the writers of Scripture is denied, and the impossibilities and contradictions of the narrative are brought forward to establish the thesis that the Scriptures are a worthless fabrication, it is a pitiable and desperate quibble indeed which the Bishop's advisers have suggested, to change "fictitious" into "unhistorical."

Even these trifles, however, are of some importance, as illustrating and damaging the strength of that which is the main strength of this book—viz., the position and character of its author. In criminal cases great hardihood to commit crime is frequently seen associated with great moral weakness. It is often so, too, in the case of infidels and heretics. It is so in the case before us. A melancholy history and a melancholy exhibition of an opiated conscience, burdened and struggling, is pictured in the preface of this book with terrible pathos. In the ministry of the Church of England unreflecting men, of no particular views, may perhaps dwell peaceably; but an earnest heretic can scarcely expect to do so with a conscience not greatly seared. In the ministry of any Church of Christ whatever, how can an infidel remain, if conscience be not altogether dead? Colenso seems to have felt immense relief when he jumped to the conclusion that the Bible was not what he felt that his ordination vows compelled him to believe or profess it to be, but which he had never really believed it, though the necessities of his position compelled him to profess it. We are confident that neither public opinion nor his own conscience will allow him to remain where he is. And we are equally confident that no critical inquiry into the contents of the Bible, nor any conviction of the weakness of the arguments for its validity, has been the real cause of his desperate leap. Long had heresy sapped his moral principles before infidelity entered. As the teaching of the early Puseyites was foreseen to be, and was proclaimed to be, and (notwithstanding the violent denials of the operators) was found to be Popery in bud, so it requires no seer or prophet to discover that this Colenso infidelity is Maurice in full flower, and that the gulf of Pantheism or Atheism is ahead of both. When men sponge out from their creed the great doctrines of the fall of man, the redemption, the propitiatory atonement for sin, justification by vicarious suffering and merit, and the everlasting ruin and punishment of the unchanged sinner—when men sponge out these articles—not to speak of the doctrines of the Trinity, the Incarnation, and other mysteries of the faith—and accept instead the dreams of Universalism, the time cannot be distant in their career when THE BOOK which contains these eternal verities must be cast to the winds as an intolerable tormentor, and Scepticism ascend the throne.

REMARKS ON A NEW SYSTEM OF ARABIC TYPE, WITH SUGGESTIONS ON ARABIC PRINTING IN GENERAL.

THERE are very peculiar difficulties connected with printing in the Oriental languages. In several of these languages—as in Hebrew, Arabic, Syriac, &c., with those that make use of the Arabic alphabet slightly modified (such as Persian, Hindustani, and Turkish)—the vowels are not regarded as independent characters; but are expressed by signs placed either above or below the consonants. Hence, in a fully-pointed Arabic text, three rows of types are required (one for the consonants, and two for the vowels), and consequently the labour of the compositor in setting up the type, and in keeping the vowels in their proper relative position, is very great, and the expense of printing proportionately so.

For the purpose of lessening expense, it has been very usual to print works in Arabic, &c., destitute of all vowel-points. In Arabic works intended for the use of scholars this is not generally of vital consequence, as it is an inconvenience which one soon gets accustomed to. In such works, too, it has been a usual habit, in cases of more than ordinary difficulty or obscurity, to supply the points.

But this inconvenience is very serious with regard to ordinary readers who cannot read freely or intelligently an unpointed text. The difficulty of reading naturally diminishes the number of readers, and adds considerably to the labour of teaching to read.

We are not, however, at all disposed on these accounts to fall in with the system of Romanising such alphabets, which has been advocated so strongly in some quarters, and which project has been before discussed in this journal.* Without resorting to such a device, a very ingenious remedy for the difficulties connected with Arabic printing has been lately devised by a Damascus missionary at present in London.

The Rev. Jules Ferrette is a missionary of the Irish Presbyterian Church. By birth a Frenchman, and originally a Dominican priest and missionary at Nineveh, he has now been for upwards of seven years a Protestant missionary in Damascus, from which he escaped almost miraculously during the fearful massacre that took place in that city two years ago.†

His invention has the merit of great simplicity, though it is not so easy to describe it on paper. In Arabic most of the consonants are connected together as in English handwriting. This causes often some modifications in the forms of the letters. The line connecting one consonant with another may be prolonged according to fancy. In cases where this connecting line is used, Mr. Ferrette makes it to carry the vowel of the preceding consonant, the vowel being thus slightly moved out of its right position, but not at all to the extent that often prevails in writing. In those cases where a connecting line cannot be used, the difficulty is met by having the consonants and vowels both cast on slender stems, a part of each consonant of this kind projecting over its stem, so as to admit of the vowel-type being slipped underneath in such a way as when printed off to appear exactly in its right position above the consonant to which it belongs.

To render our explanation more intelligible to those interested in such matters, we give the following; showing the type spaced out, in order, as far as possible, to exhibit Mr. Ferrette's plan, to whose kindness we are indebted for the specimen:—

كَانَتِ الظُّلُمَةُ عَلَى وَجْهِ الْغُورِ

(“Darkness was upon the face of the deep.”)

The following line will serve as a specimen of the type when connected, and as it will appear in print, by which it will be seen that in appearance it does not differ perceptibly from other Arabic type:—

وَقَالَ اللَّهُ لِيَكُنْ نُورٌ فَكَانَ نُورٌ

(“And God said, Let there be light, and there was light.”)

Mr. Ferrette's plan has this great advantage, that by its adoption Arabic can be printed with all its vowel-points, &c., by means of one line of type, instead of three, as formerly. This is no trivial advantage, as it will cause an immense saving of time and expense. Under the present system, the New Testament and many other Arabic works printed at the excellent printing press of the American missionaries at Beyrout have had to be printed for the most part without vowels or the other signs. We are glad to hear that the Turkish Missions-Aid Society, which is ever so ready to assist such undertakings, has granted 50% towards this new scheme. The Christian Knowledge Society has also made a grant of 30% for the same purpose. Mr. Ferrette proposes to set up a printing press at Damascus, in which this type is to be used. He ought to be supported liberally by British Christians, so as to enable him not only to bring out with him a fount of this small, though clear Arabic type, but also several other founts of larger-sized type cast on the same plan. The above type will serve excellently for many purposes, but it is too small for all necessary purposes.

This plan of Mr. Ferrette with respect to Arabic is easily adaptable not only to Turkish, Hindustani, and Persian—all which alphabets are essentially Arabic—but also to Syriac, and even to Hebrew, when printed with its vowels, but without accents. It may perhaps be found that Hebrew, with its numerous accents, will baffle all attempts to adapt this system to its requirements.

Those acquainted with Arabic cannot fail to have observed that in the above specimens all the vowels and orthographical signs have not been given. Mr. Ferrette proposes only to affix such points as are necessary to the correct reading and full understanding of the language, although on his system, and with his fount of type, all the orthographical signs and vowels can be affixed when required.

There is not much objection to this plan, which has indeed often been partially carried out; that is, there are Arabic works in which all those signs and vowels which can easily be supplied are omitted, but in which those marks and vowels are affixed whenever their absence would cause doubt or difficulty. The appearance of books printed after Mr. Ferrette's plan will be that of only partially-pointed Arabic, but for all practical purposes they will, if correctly edited, be as useful as fully-pointed books, and perhaps, for the ordinary run of readers, less confusing.

We may be permitted to remind our readers, that in printed Hebrew several orthographical signs found in MSS. are constantly omitted, without any harm resulting from their omission; as, for instance, the raphe, and the mappik with ' and ', &c. Similarly, in Syriac several orthographical marks are totally omitted in printed books, and are only to be found in specimen works, as Bernstein's edition of St. John's Gospel (Philoxenian Version).

While we are writing on the subject of Arabic type, we may be permitted to make some practical suggestions on the mode of supplying the defects in Arabic printing in general.

1. Capital letters are of very great service in the Roman type, especially in enabling us to distinguish at once proper names. The Arabic will not admit the use of capitals; but were a line to be drawn over each proper name, as is done partially in Arabic geographical works, &c., the same object would be attained. The following verse, Gen. iv. 1 (Saadiah's Version) will exhibit our view:—

ثم ان ادم واقع حواء زوجته فحملت وولدت
قايين فقال قد رزقت رجلا من عند الله

This system has been used also to express contractions; but for that purpose we would suggest the propriety of adhering to the use of the flourish, as عَم contracted for عَلَيْهِ السَّلَام, "Peace be upon him!" It is also used to distinguish the text of the Koran, &c., from the comments thereon; but for this and similar purposes our next suggestion will be preferable.

2. Italics are another valuable appendage to the Roman type. All the advantages connected therewith—such as giving prominence to certain words—could be easily attained in Arabic by procuring founts of type, of all the required sizes, of a thicker face than the ordinary Arabic type, and bearing the same relation thereto as the Egyptian type to the ordinary English type in the following example:—

In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.

If even this plan should not commend itself to Arabic scholars, it would be very easy from Arabic MSS. to draw a type which would lean more to the right hand side than the ordinary, and which would suit admirably for italics.

3. To compress Arabic into smaller bounds, reject all litteræ majusculæ, and curtail slightly the curls of the letters, without reducing the size of the type. The slightest curtailment will tell, though it may be scarcely perceptible to the eye.

4. Marks of punctuation would be a useful addition to Arabic. We would suggest the star (*) for a full point; for a semicolon, the ∴ or ∷, used in Syriac for a full point; for a comma, the ∴, used thus in Syriac; and as a mark of interrogation, two points (∴) placed obliquely from left to right, used often in this way in Syriac. Professor Forbes has used, in Persian and Hindustani, the star for the full point, and a dash (—) for a half stop (our comma or semicolon), and as a mark of interrogation, our own sign, only reversed (r).

5. Make a systematic use of paragraphs, as Professor Forbes has done in his edition of the "Bāgh-o-Bahār," and other works.

We throw out these suggestions, and hope in time to see something like them adopted in common use; but reforms of this kind do, and perhaps ought to, proceed slowly. None of them can be said to be any very great innovation, and they are certainly no attempt at Anglicising, of which we entirely disapprove.

Biography.

THE LATE DR. BARTH.*

ON the 12th of November, the Rev. C. G. Barth, D.D., breathed his last in the house of the Verlags Verein, at Calw, Wurttemberg, after a protracted, and latterly, at times, most painful illness. His wish for an easy dissolution was fulfilled. He departed without a struggle, shortly after having, for the first time during daylight, sought rest on his bed. A labourer has gone to his repose who has had few equals in his time and country. Born in 1799, he grew up with our century, and took his full share in the labours and successes, in the battles and victories which fell to the lot of the men who, soon after the memorable third centenary of the German Reformation, stood forth as the champions of the faith, love and hope of the true Gospel among a generation awakening from a long spiritual torpor. In his youth he gave himself to the Lord, and his whole life has been devoted to the service of his Master, whose praises he sung in his poems and hymns, whose name he made known to the generation which grew up before his eyes, by a variety of works calculated to engage the minds and hearts of the young on the side of Christ, and whose kingdom he laboured to extend in his native country, in Europe, in the world. The German and Foreign School-book Society, commonly called the Verlags Verein, of Calw, to whose service he gave his best energies since 1838, and which, it is hoped, will survive its founder, is a younger sister of the Religious Tract Society. It has furnished Germany with a library of Christian, of Evangelical school-books, some of which have been translated into most European, and many African and Asiatic languages. Of the chief Missionary Society of Germany, whose head-quarters are at Basle, he was one of the oldest, most zealous, and most faithful friends and advocates. He, in fact, introduced or popularised in Germany the lighter sort of missionary periodicals, whereof for years he has edited three or four a month; as also the system of missionary addresses freely delivered in any church that was opened to him. His loss will be felt by a large number of missionaries dispersed over the world, from Labrador to New Zealand, from China to North America, with whom he has kept up a lively correspondence for twenty or thirty years. He was a loving brother and hearty friend to all who loved the Lord Jesus, in all countries, nations, and Churches; a genuine Evangelical Alliance man, long before the time of the Evangelical Alliance, at whose formation he was, however, present in London (August, 1846), and to whose cause he has remained firmly attached. He was known to the Lord's people all over Germany, and they who knew him loved him. Good scholarship, large and varied information, uncommon eloquence, indomitable industry, extraordinary, even in a German author, combined with a rare singleness of purpose, an affectionate disposition, a lively wit, a rich vein of humour—excellences to which were added the higher graces of the Spirit—rendered Dr. Barth a man of note among the champions of the Gospel in Germany. He will be remembered, and his memory will be blessed by thousands of men and children whom his books have delighted and instructed, and withal led to Christ, or whose hearts his eloquence has touched and quickened to love and zeal in the cause of Christ for the salvation of a lost world.

For several years atrophy of the heart gradually reduced his strength. His increasing inability to work according to his wishes was a great trial to him. During the last two months, his sufferings were very great, but he bore them patiently. He has overcome, by the blood of the Lamb. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord. They rest from their labours, and their works follow them."

FRANCE.

—, France, November, 1862.

A NEW AND SINGULAR ADVOCATE OF THE POPE'S TEMPORAL POWER.

The name of M. Proudhon is not unknown, I suppose, to your readers. He was a Socialist and a demagogue who, in 1848, and the succeeding years, surpassed all other enthusiasts of the same kind by the revolting extravagance of his opinions. M. Proudhon avowed himself openly, and with horrible insolence of language, to be an Atheist. He said, in a celebrated sentence, "God, He is evil! God is Satan!!" He affirmed also that property was the product of theft! After the establishment of the Napoleonic régime, this writer was condemned to three years' imprisonment, because, in a work entitled "The Revolution and the Church," he had put forth the most impious and immoral propositions. His work concluded with an invocation to Satan!

Well, this same Proudhon has recently published some pamphlets, in which he violently attacks those who demand the fall of the temporal power of the Papacy. He maintains that Rome ought to remain indefinitely in the hands of the Sovereign Pontiffs—that the unity of Italy is an impracticable chimera—that the Italians are not prepared to be constituted a free nation—that Cavour was wanting in political sagacity, and so forth. These writings consist of a violent diatribe against the liberals, and a plea on behalf of the clerical faction. Such a change of ideas and sentiments ought not, however, greatly to astonish intelligent and serious minds. Extremes meet, according to the proverb. M. Proudhon is incapable of preserving, in any discussion, the happy medium; and, after having embraced the last excesses of Materialism and Communism, it was natural to expect that he would be equally extravagant in the opposite opinion. But what justly excites our astonishment is, to witness the great joy of the Jesuits and Ultramontanes at the appearance of such an auxiliary, and the enthusiastic reception they have accorded him. You must note that M. Proudhon has not formally disavowed his impious antecedents. He has not declared that his Atheism has given place to faith in God. The only thing he has really done has been to insult the Italians, to outrage the liberals, and to plead for the preservation of the Pope's temporal power. This is enough! The organs of Jesuitism have freely opened to M. Proudhon the columns of their journals; they have put forth his arguments as incontrovertible proofs, and been prodigal in their emphatic praises of the author and his book. M. Proudhon has become, in their eyes, almost a father of the Church! Be it so; we by no means envy the strange recruit thus made by the Ultramontanes. Let them exalt M. Proudhon and his logic, if they please; it is their affair, not ours. We remark only that their cause is greatly compromised by the apology of this famous demagogue; and the operatives of Paris, who followed the banner of M. Proudhon twelve or fifteen years ago, will not accompany him into the camp of the Jesuits.

IMMODERATE PRETENSIONS OF THE CLERICAL PARTY.

You are aware that Napoleon III. has given to the Court of Rome new pledges of his good-will, by appointing M. Drouyn de Lhuys as Minister of Foreign Affairs, in the room of M. Thouvenel. He doubtless hoped, by this act of complaisance, to obtain the thanks of the Pontifical See, and the praises of the French clergy. If, however, he reckoned on the gratitude of the clerical party, he may now see his error. Far from being satisfied with what they have gained, the Pope and the prelates have seized this opportunity to renew the most exorbitant pretensions. This fact deserves to be well considered. At Rome, Pius IX. and Cardinal Antonelli regard all concessions simply as the payment of a debt. They still accuse Napoleon III. of being the chief author of their actual embarrassments, and persist in designating him Pontius Pilate in their private conversations. Not a word in approval of the change effected in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, or in the person of the French Ambassador—no description of reform. M. de Merode, who is personally hostile to the French Government, and who has gravely denounced the Emperor, is maintained in his office of War Minister, and the Pontifical Zouaves are encouraged in their manifestations on behalf of the Comte de Chambord, the heir of the Bourbons, the pretender to the crown of France! Give satisfaction to the Papacy! It is like the grave, which never says, it is enough!

In France the Monde, and the other daily organs of the episcopal party, constantly reiterate that the status quo is, in the Roman question, impossible. They demand that Umbria, the Marches, and the Romagna—in other words, the whole of the territory which he governed before the war of Italy—should be restored to the Pope. These provinces, say they, are the property of God; and ought immediately to be restored to the Vicar of Jesus Christ. Victor Emmanuel, by taking them, has violated all laws, human and Divine; he is a usurper and a robber! But how are these provinces, which, spontaneously and almost unanimously, proclaimed their annexation to the kingdom of Italy, to be again brought under the yoke of Pontifical authority? If we listen to the declarations of the Ultramontane party, nothing can be more simple or easy. Napoleon III. ought to command the Italians to evacuate the “domains of the Church” throughout their whole extent; and should they refuse to obey, he must compel them by the force of arms! Imagine the Emperor requiring the French soldiers to march against the Italians, shedding the blood of his allies, and utterly disregarding the loudly-expressed wishes of Romagna and the other annexed provinces! This prospect does not deter the Jesuits. They maintain that it would be an act of justice, and the re-establishment of a sacred right. When M. de La Guéronnière, in his journal La France, objects to these pugnacious Papists, that it is morally and politically impossible to employ our troops to oppress the Italians, they merely reply that this politician does not deserve the name of (Roman) Catholic, and place him in the number of the most dangerous revolutionists. Assuredly Napoleon will never commit the irreparable fault of sending his troops against the Italians. This would be, on his part, a species of political suicide. Supposing, moreover, by a gratuitous hypothesis, that Pius IX. were replaced at the head of all the ancient Pontifical territory, would the Jesuits exact nothing more? Quite the contrary. Victor Emmanuel has been excommunicated, and would be compelled humbly to solicit his pardon at the Pontiff's feet. After that, it would only remain to restore to the Pope all the privileges of the mediæval age! Napoleon is not ignorant of this. We may hope, therefore, that he will not follow the Pope and the Jesuits to the very depths of the abyss.

NEW COLLECTION OF ST. PETER'S PENCE.

In the midst of these delays and these conflicts, the Pontifical treasury is very greatly embarrassed. Many debts, very heavy expenses, and but low revenues. How is the balance to be restored? Pius IX. devoted enormous sums to the fêtes which accompanied the canonisation of the Japanese martyrs. These were very magnificent, but magnificence is expensive. Moreover, the cardinals and other ecclesiastics of Rome have never admitted the necessity for retrenching one farthing in the expenses of their tables and luxurious living, notwithstanding the decrease of their receipts. Add to this the payment of the Pontifical Zouaves, and other expenses, to please the military vanity of Pius IX. and M. de Merode. With what pecuniary resources are these charges to be met? St. Peter's penny, which finds favour throughout Catholic Europe, has contributed some millions of francs. These voluntary gifts would have sufficed, had a wise economy regulated their application. But the extravagance of the Pontifical Court has exhausted everything. The bankers refuse to lend money to the cardinals. The lotteries produce but little; the taxes are but badly paid. How, then, shall the Pope's empty chests be refilled? That is the question, and it is not easy to answer it.

The bishops have received orders to renew the collections, and are zealously fulfilling their instructions. The Bishop of Amiens has ordered his vicars and curates to go from house to house to solicit the donations of the faithful. Should the priests collect large sums, they will obtain a title to high ecclesiastical dignities, and ambition will thus stimulate their zeal. But whether much will be obtained is, I think, doubtful. These incessant collections produce a very unfavourable impression amongst certain classes of the people. At the beginning of winter, when so many are out of work, and suffering great privations, the clergy take money from France to pay the Roman soldiers and the Neapolitan brigands, and to support the luxury of the Pontifical Court. The bishops ought to beware; their covetousness multiplies unbelievers, and threatens to raise a terrible storm against themselves.

INTOLERANT CONDUCT TOWARDS A BAPTIST MINISTER.

It is very difficult for our subordinate magistrates—and perhaps for the French character—to respect, under all circumstances, the principles and the rights of religious liberty. At Grandru, in the department de l'Oise, in the neighbourhood of Paris, an aged man of the Baptist communion recently died. Naturally enough, a minister of the same denomination, M. Victor Lepoids, who resides at some miles distance, was asked to conduct the funeral service. On entering the village, he learned that objection had been taken to his so doing, at the instigation of the Romish curé, who probably dreaded that a Protestant should speak to the peasants some words of Gospel truth and consolation. M. Lepoids thereon went to the mayor of the commune, to explain the duty he had come to fulfil. But with the mayor he found two gendarmes, or agents of police, who required him to exhibit, on paper, his credentials as a minister. M. Lepoids was taken aback at this demand. He had not imagined that, in the neighbourhood of his own residence—in a district in which his pastoral position had been known for twenty years—he would be forced to show his certificate of consecration to the holy ministry. It was a mere trick, contrived to prevent him from fulfilling his engagement. The mayor and gendarmes forbade any funeral ceremony, and M. Lepoids had to submit to this flagrant act of intolerance. The unhappy widow was deeply afflicted; the relatives and friends were indignant. M. Lepoids was even threatened with legal proceedings, as though he had committed an illegal act! Such proceedings, however, will not be taken; for the tribunals would not sanction conduct so arbitrary. What right have a mayor and gendarmes to shut the mouth of a respectable minister of Christ? Were religious liberty in France fully carried out, the Mayor of Grandru would be deprived and punished for having violated the rights of a religious community.

EXTENSION OF SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

Amongst the institutions which contribute to the progress of vital Christianity, Sunday-schools occupy one of the first positions. In this matter, French Protestants have followed the example of their brethren of Great Britain and the United States. Paris has had, for some years, a Sunday-school Society, which labours for the propagation of these excellent establishments, and is well supported by all our evangelical pastors, and even by others who profess what they call liberal opinions. Hence, Sunday-schools are rapidly increasing. The Reformed Church now has 399; the Lutheran, 29; the Independents have 59; the Methodists, 29; the Anglicans, 41; the Baptists, 8; and the Calvinistic Methodists, 1; making a total of 536. These are distributed over 66 departments—23, in which the Protestants are few and scattered, being without Sunday-schools. The Lutherans have but few schools of this sort in proportion to their numbers. The Paris society publishes a Sunday-school Magazine, and edits or superintends a library for Sunday-schools, containing works of biography, religious history, Christian anecdotes, and general edification. It may be hoped that this institution will train up a new generation, better instructed in the truths of the Gospel than their fathers, and more devoted in the practice of its duties.

REPORT OF THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH OF LYONS.

I have often had occasion to speak of the Evangelical Church of Lyons, which forms a community distinct and independent of all others. Its sphere of labour is extensive, since it comprises the second city of the French Empire, with its adjacent suburbs. The last report of this church contains some interesting facts, illustrating the recent attacks made upon it by the Romanist association of St. François de Sales. "Lutheranism," say these apologists of Rome, "is Pantheism! . . . Religious Radicalism conceals itself under the old name of National Calvinism. . . . Anglicanism is upon the same road; the abyss of Rationalism awaits it. . . . The Evangelical Alliance admits, as its only dogma, that every one must be left at full liberty to choose or form his own opinions." I quote these passages to show the bad faith, or the prodigious ignorance, of these adversaries of the Reformation.

The same society of St. François de Sales accuses the Church of Lyons of having adopted the doctrines of Wesley, and adds that Methodism is much to be dreaded for its proselytising spirit, and that "it has already done much evil" in that diocese. This shows that the Christians of Lyons have obtained successes which alarm the Jesuits.

RATIONALISM AMONGST THE LUTHERANS OF ALSACE.

The Lutheran Church in France undoubtedly comprises many orthodox and devoted pastors. But it is matter of regret that Rationalistic theories are gaining ground amongst the Lutherans of Alsace, and especially at Strasburg. One of the leaders of the negative school, M. Colani, has been appointed pastor of a parish in that city, and M. Bruch, Dean of the Lutheran Faculty of Theology, has proclaimed that the essence of the Reformation is free examination. The Confession of Augsburg has become a purely nominal tradition, and the new theology takes no account of it. What would Martin Luther say, could he return to the world?

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS IN THE SOUTH.

South of France, November, 1862.

THE STRUGGLE BETWEEN ORTHODOXY AND RATIONALISM.

Allow me to send you a few lines as supplement to the valuable communications of your regular French correspondent. I wish to communicate to the readers of your journal some intelligence specially from the South of France.

In the department of the Gard, where the Protestants are the most numerous, Protestantism is undergoing, at this moment, a crisis that is worthy of serious attention. The religious parties—viz., the Rationalists and the orthodox—which until now have been more or less accordant, are tending to separate openly, in consequence of the increasing boldness of the Rationalists in expressing their subversive opinions. The separation is now a matter of fidelity and duty for the orthodox. This necessary antagonism broke out lately in the last pastoral conference of the Gard, held at St. Hyppolite.

This meeting of thirty or forty pastors numbered but three or four evangelical members. The reading of the opening paper, drawn up by a young pastor, analysing the book of a M. Larroque, an infidel professor of the university, against the Christian religion, was followed by a discussion, in the course of which the most extreme negative opinions were expressed, especially by the pastors C—, from Nîmes, and G—, from Montpellier. The former said that M. Larroque was entirely right in some of his attacks, and particularly in those upon the original sin and the expiatory death of Christ; the latter affirmed that M. Larroque was destroying the official, the traditional Christianity, but was attacking in no way his own Christianity, which was a Christianity anterior to doctrines and to the Church. Another would absolutely have it that M. Larroque was a Christian, although this notorious infidel has openly said quite the contrary. Note also that at the two or three preceding conferences the chief speakers had denied the inspiration and authority of the Holy Scriptures, the Deity of the Lord Jesus Christ, &c., and that some young pastors of the new Rationalist school declared, at the meeting of the following day, that there is an abyss between orthodoxy and their opinions. The orthodox were therefore compelled to make an emphatic protest. They forthwith resolved upon a separation, and notified to the meeting that henceforth they would no more form a part of the pastoral conferences of the Gard. That resolution made a deep impression among the assembly. A new conference must be formed by the Evangelicals.

RELIGIOUS PROGRESS IN THE DROME AND THE ARDECHE.

In the department of the Drôme things are in a better state, as also in the neighbouring department of the Ardèche. The Evangelicals have the upper hand, and the religious movement is progressing in a rejoicing manner. The revival numbers numerous friends in those countries among the pastors and the laymen. Some of them have even formed an association for the promotion of that gracious work of the Holy Spirit. That association, known under the name of the Fraternal Association for Evangelization, has existed nearly a year, and it has already accomplished a blessed work. I was present at the last meeting of its members, and was greatly rejoiced by the reports of the labours of those engaged in connexion with it. Forty-five towns, villages, or hamlets—in the Drôme, Ardèche, Haute-Loire, and Isère—have been evangelised, and in some of those districts revivals have taken place, and many souls have been converted, especially at R— and M—, in the Haute-Loire; at A—, M—, and two little villages near St. A—, in the Ardèche; at D—, L. Ch—, M—, and S—, in the Drôme. I could give your readers some cheering details on this matter. I will only relate that, in two little localities of the Ardèche, where the inhabitants have maintained the primitive simplicity of their Protestant ancestors, and a true love for the religious things, two fellow-labourers of the association (schoolmasters) have engaged in the work with such devotedness, that in one of those localities three or four persons, and in the other six or seven only, remained unconverted.

Recently a member of the association, M. Pastor C—, has made a "tour of evangelization" in the south of the Ardèche, where his labours have been abundantly blessed. He had good congregations in the churches, private houses, and even in a silk factory; in short, the work of God is making good progress. And here is a curious fact: The Plymouth Brethren ("Darbyites," as they are called here), seeing the kingdom of God advancing, are desirous of breaking their isolation, and in certain quarters some of them have preferred to leave their fellow-believers, in order to take a part with the living members of our churches in the religious movement.

THE UNION OF CHRISTIAN YOUNG MEN.

The Union of the Christian Young Men, which forms a group composed of fifteen associations, is also in the churches a powerful instrumentality for advancing the work of God, not only among the youth, but generally; for some of their members are ardent and gifted evangelists. The group had, lately (the 1st November), its general meeting, at Beaufort. The meeting lasted two days, and was a true rendezvous of the Christian youth of the department of the Drôme, and a true Christian feast for the Christians of five or six neighbouring churches. You presume easily that such a gathering of so many disciples of the Lord was not unprofitable to the cause of the Gospel. Some interesting details might be related as to the meeting and the work of the Union of the Christian Young Men; but I must end my letter, already too long.—I remain, &c., Z.

ITALY.

Florence, November 18, 1862.

GARIBALDI, VICTOR EMMANUEL, AND THE PEOPLE.

We are now experiencing the truth of the proverb, "After a storm comes a calm." It is not so settled a calm, however, as the preceding thunderstorm promised. Though no immediate danger is apprehended, broken electric clouds are scattered over an otherwise serene Italian sky. The hero of Aspromonte lies a wounded freeman in Pisa. When the news of his ignoble capture reached the Royal ear, the King was grieved beyond measure, and angrily pacing his chamber, cried, "Oh, my right hand man! my right hand man!" With the stricken Garibaldi the hopes of Italy, which cheered the palace and the hovel, lie bleeding. But not to death. The fiat of the Imperial Frenchman prohibits Rome to aspiring Italy. The worst is now known, and, strange to say, is acquiesced in for the moment. The earnest advice of the English and French press, and the good sense of the people, have restrained the mercurial temperament of the land. Political juggling, from the Roman question to the Venetian, from home to foreign affairs, has given place to a desire for internal organization and the development of the resources of the country, that Italy may prove herself worthy of a capital, and that the necessity of having her ancient centre of power may become more apparent to the world. We feel the argument strengthening daily in the rapid progress of free institutions around us. The beggars of Bologna are an extinct race, and pauperism is confined to the new poorhouse of the district. The worse than beggars of Leghorn (the porters and cabmen) are broken in and regulated in their extortionate charges by a reasonable tariff. Duke of Argyll post-boxes meet us at every corner, and in every direction railways are extending to more distant stations. The adult population, sunk in ignorance, has gone to school, and intelligence shows itself in enlarging traffic and fresh enterprises. There is no department of human activity in which the great uprising of a united Italy is not plainly discernible. Turin is full of plots and counterplots as to a new or altered Ministry, which little interests the people. Discussions as to a temporary change of capital from Turin to Florence, or Naples, are carried on without exciting much sympathy. The ardent cry is for reform, unification, progress within the Alps and the Straits—not material advancement alone, but moral too. One large assembly proposes to petition for the abolition of lotteries, the curse of the middle and lower classes; another demands the removal from the statute-book of its first law, whereby the Church of Rome is declared the religion of the State. Mind and purpose are alive, and questionings of grave import stir the soul.

THE POPE AND THE EX-KING.

The Court of Rome is in a paroxysm of joy. Its triumph is complete, and the patriotic aim seems baffled. There is a pride, however, which goes before a fall, and a joy which is short-lived. Heedless of warning, the Pope reviews his 9,000 troops of Irish recruits, Swiss Guards, French Zouaves, and such like; runs deeper into debt, wherever a loan can be raised, than his present small obligation of sixteen millions sterling; and patronises the brigandage which is desolating worse than ever the Southern provinces, by sheltering ex-King Bemba, in whose Roman palace are publicly ensconced the various Ministers of War, Finance, and Foreign Affairs. No argument can coax his Holiness to appoint men in connexion with the Government at Turin to fill any of the thirty-six vacant bishoprics, nor to open the finished line of rail between Rome and Naples. The Vatican breathes forth violence. The poor Jews resident in Velletri are ordered to expatriate themselves, owing to supposed sympathy with freedom; while the whole effects of Passaglia are confiscated, and the rental of the abbé's little Roman property is thrown into the treasury of "Peter's Pence," as the only reply of the Holy Father to the petition of the 10,000 priests, begging a renunciation, once and for ever, of the temporal power.

PAINFUL POSITION OF THE LIBERAL AND REFORMING PRIESTS.

The position of the large body of liberal and reforming priests is a very painful one at this moment. Many of them are obliged to say "peccavi," forswear their convictions, and resume duty in the Church, in order to keep soul and body together. Should an effectiveshield ever be thrown over them—to protect them from episcopal intolerance, or a bare pittance to keep them from starving, when driven from the altar, be granted by the Government—there is no doubt that the rank and file of the Passagian clergy will be at least doubled. Unfortunately, the merely secular aim of the Government has hitherto denied every encouragement, and withheld substantial aid. No more bigoted aristocracy exists than that of Piedmont, so that the Upper House of the Italian Parliament, whose members have been educated at home by priests, rivals the French Chamber of Peers in its valorous defence of the interests of the Papacy. The leading politicians of Italy are men of no religious views, and ignorantly judging the Papacy to be a worldly system, believe in the possibility of a combination, and will do nothing to give umbrage to the Pope, however great the provocation. Not only is there—despite all untoward appearances—this thorough belief in the coming reconciliation of the civil and religious systems of Pope and Parliament, but it must be confessed that there is the pride of heart to hope that, when this reconciliation is accomplished, through clever scheming, the vast spiritual power wielded by the Pope, as a subject of the King of Italy, will be under their governance, and give Italy the palm among Roman Catholic countries. It is this vain delusion, that the Papacy has all along been, and may still continue to be, the crowning glory of Italy, which leads to overture after overture, of every kind, to bring about an understanding, and shuts up the bowels of mercy towards the thousands of liberal priests, through whose support the Government might go forward in a strong and definite protesting line of action, which would frighten the whole conclave of cardinals. Hitherto it has been the interest of the priest, and he knows it well, to side with the Pope, who succours powerfully his minions when the law of the land falls heavy upon them, while the country has left to beggary the priests who joined the popular movement, and were thereby driven from ecclesiastical position and emoluments. The wonder is, to see so many liberal men in the priesthood daring, under the circumstances, to cast in their lot with free institutions. It was observed that not a single Sicilian bishop appended his name to the address to Pio Nono from the Neapolitan episcopate, whose members had not been allowed to join in the demonstration at Rome in May last. The plain inference was, that they were to a man of opposite opinions to their sixty-six brethren on the mainland. Again, the clergy of Pisticci, in the South, being wholly liberal, a commemoration takes place safely each autumn of the death of Bishop Macco, who suffered nobly in the defence of popular rights under the Bourbons. When the same unanimity of liberal feeling does not prevail, or when the arm of the leading ecclesiastic of the province is strong and vindictive, a very different result follows, as we are now seeing, from the revived hope and joy of bigotry caused by the shelving of the Roman question. There are hundreds of cases of isolated priests throughout the country, who, in ones and twos, received the King in their country parishes or provincial towns as he passed by, and have, for that reason, been dismissed from their sacred functions. These men—unless gifted in some other department, which they rarely are, so as to be able to gain a livelihood, or reconciled to their superiors through penitent confession and degrading humiliations—are left to starve in a land where, above all others, pity or sympathy for the detested priest is unknown.

DISSOLUTION OF SOCIETIES OF LIBERAL PRIESTS.

But we refer now to more public matters. A Venetian priest, Volpe, published last summer, in a secure retreat, a book touching the liberal opinions of the Venetian clergy on the Roman question. The ill-advised, but truthful, pamphlet was largely circulated in Venetia. The ire of the Papal party has been roused; so much so, that, finding private vexations insufficient, an address of obedience to the Pope was sent round for signature, and all the priests (and they are many) who refused to sign have been dealt with in the harshest and most unchristian spirit. Again, the association of liberal priests, in Milan, has been compelled to bring its proceedings to a close by Monsignore Caccia, as the Archbishop of Florence brought our priestly "Mutual Aid Society" to grief last year. Lombard sturdiness of character has not availed in presence of the machinations and blandishments of the Jesuit bishop. An appeal to Rome, individually or collectively, was useless. Equally so an appeal to the Government to convoke a diocesan council, to judge between the parties; and so these half-enlightened men scruple to resist the canonical law, and submit, with bitter reluctance, to an unscrupulous, disreputable, and domineering prelate. I am also sorry to say, that to-day is issued the last number of the Colonna di Fuoco, the daily organ of the wide-spread priestly association of Naples. Though its expiring words hold out some hope of a recommencement next year, on a wider platform, and with greater force, it is but too evident that funds and friends have failed, that dire opposition from the foe has done its work, and that the society whose flag has thus been struck may soon itself be expected to go to the wall. These "Aid Societies" among the priests, which are so fast disappearing, have been the special grudge of the Court of Rome, and no weapon has been unused to overthrow them. They were instituted singly, two or three years ago, in the various provinces, in order, by small weekly contributions from all the members, to maintain any poor and unprotected priest who might happen to fall under the episcopal ban through his liberal opinions. Crescioli and Solocchi inaugurated the movement in Tuscany; Reali and Spinucci followed in Umbria; then came Salvoni and Tiboni in Lombardy, and Caputo and Testi in the South. Through the influence of Passaglia and the late Bishop Caputo, these societies merged into one in January, 1861, and issued the Colonna di Fuoco. Unaided by the State, they have never complained, but only petitioned for work for their unoccupied and dependent brethren—a concession which only in the most indirect and infinitesimal way has been made, so as not to compromise the powers that be. Sad though the story and the struggle of these bold organizations is, they have served successfully and long the double purpose of rallying the scattered forces of the liberal clergy and resisting the high-handed measures of Antonelli and Co.

PASSAGLIA AND HIS FOLLOWERS OPPOSED TO REFORM IN DOCTRINE.

The attitude of these priests has been largely misunderstood. Whatever their fir-step may yet lead to, it has not been sufficiently known that it is yet a first step, and nothing more. That a number of them have received kindly the English Prayer-book is a fact; that many of them are diligent readers of the Bible is also true. A few may also have shown some sympathy for the suggestion from the banks of the Thames, to plead and petition for a decree (which need not be quoted in its several articles) constituting the King the head of the Church, and the Parliament the regulator of its revenues, while the spiritual functions are left formally to the bishops and prelates, with severe penalties attached to disobedience of any or all of these authorities. But the mass of these priests have made no such progress, nay, scout the very idea of ever so progressing. The Colonna di Fuoco, which astonished the world last year by its article on the reading of the Bible in the school, the church, and the family, has long ago explained that the temporal power is the alone object it sought to remove, and that for the purpose of consolidating more securely the spiritual power of the Church. It has gone frequently and afar out of its way to show that only the discipline, and not at all the faith or customs of Rome, needed amendment. A second and careful perusal of Passaglia's pamphlets, in the order in which they were written, convinces us that, whatever a few of his adherents and followers, such as Reali and Perfetti, may desire or strive after, the only ambition of the ex-Jesuit editor of the Mediatore is to constitute the Church more powerful in all her spiritual influence, by the removal of the dead weight of the temporal power. The marvel is, that the assembled bishops should remain unconvinced, with such a mass of patristic learning, historical knowledge, and logical demonstration before them, and that a man so lynx-eyed in discovering, and so daring and conclusive in exposing, the past blunders and present follies of the infallible Papacy, should retain that profound veneration for the Pope, as Christ's vicar, and hearty submission to all the bishops, and ordinances, and dogmas of the Church. It seems self-contradictory; but so it is. A much less able, and still less decorous book, appeared two months ago, from the pen of a disciple of the same school, Senator Siotto Pintor, in which the Pope and bishops are covered with the epithets which a profane world considers much nearer the truth.

So hostile is Passaglia to breathing a sentiment in favour of a reform of doctrine, that his Mediatore is everywhere called the "Smezzatore" (literally, the sharp drawer of a line of demarcation) by the few who long for the abolition of all unscriptural tenets, and a return to the primitive simplicity of the Gospel. In this respect a remarkable treatise has appeared, from the pen of Tiboni, Canon of Brescia Cathedral, on the "Secularization of the Bible," by which he means its re-translation and widest possible circulation among the laity in the language of the country. Versed in the ancient languages, he is unsparing in holding up to contempt the Bible of Martini, as a translation from another translation, the incorrect Vulgate, and most candid in showing the extraordinary fidelity and charming style of Diodati, whose Calvinism, however, so shocks the canon's taste, that he argues for a new translation, in which the researches of modern critical science might be embodied, and the dogmatic faith of the Church preserved. He has no patience with the ignorant priests who revile Diodati, and imagines that the only way to counteract the influences of the tens of thousands of copies of heretical Diodati, circulated by foreign Bible societies, is to replace it with an equally good translation, which will conserve all the tenets of the Catholic faith.

SUPPRESSION OF CONVENTUAL ESTABLISHMENTS.

The day is not far off when justice will be done to the liberal priests. There is a strong conviction, both in Parliament and among the thinking classes, that the policy of coquetting with Rome has been carried on too long, and the unsolved and apparently insoluble Roman question is giving this conviction depth and force. Already the conventual establishments of the North, East, and South have been suppressed, the houses turned into barracks or schools, the lands drained and properly wrought, a suitable compensation being given during life to the inmates. The same process takes effect immediately in Lombardy, Tuscany and Sicily. Only a few houses are excepted, in connexion with which there are large schools, for the priestly education is at a discount: it is considered better than nothing, in the present deplorable state of ignorance. Not even the famous Vallombrosa is to be spared. The gain effected in this way enabled the Legislature to give 7,000*l.* this year for educational purposes in Naples. But a far more sweeping measure was promised by the Government last session—viz., the alienation of the ecclesiastical property in Italy, whose present value is twelve millions sterling. It has been obtained through mortmain gifts, is badly managed, and therefore unremunerative. The marsh between Pisa and Leghorn is an example, and Sicily is covered with this kind of property. It is not to be confiscated, for the present annual revenue of 600,000*l.* will be given from the Government funds instead; but the ground will be let out in connexion with the railway enterprises, and its value will so increase, that an immense surplus will be secured, which it is purposed to expend on education, the underpaid clergy, the liberal and suffering priests, and works of public utility—thus fulfilling, instead of thwarting, the pious wishes of the testators.

STATE OF RELIGION.

The question is often put, "What about the progress of vital godliness in Italy?" We feel our incompetence to answer. The number of Bibles circulated, and of Bible readers, of evangelical preachers and meetings and adherents, of schools and school children, is increasing rapidly, and our persuasion is that the vital element is present in the onward movement, amid much curiosity, hypocrisy, and formalism. More than this it would at present be rash to say, as the intense excitement on political subjects is both helping and hindering, in a curiously mixed manner, the cause of the Gospel. Our own conviction, so far as information reaches us from various quarters, is that souls are being enlightened and converted in ones and twos, here and there, while we are equally convinced that no great spiritual blessing from on high has yet descended on poor Italy. For this we long and pray, in the hope that God is now secretly preparing the men of great faith and deep humility and practical godliness, who are to be used as instruments when His time to favour Italy has come.

THE WALDENSIAN COLONY IN SOUTH AMERICA.

In one of the Government blue-books a valuable document, written by the Italian Consul at Montevideo, is published, giving details, historical, statistical and religious, with regard to the Waldensian colony of Rosario, in the republic of Uruguay. In 1858 there were only 45 families, now there are 67, counting 354 persons; a number which, by next year, will be brought up to 500, owing to the stream of emigrants from the Valleys by successive vessels from Genoa. Such is the healthiness of the district, watered by the broad La Plata, that, during the last two years, with thirty-two births, there have only been three deaths. The soil is so fertile, and the population so industrious, that many of the colonists have already redeemed their farms from the Spanish Colonisation Society, while this little people, whose sober habits and truthfulness have ensured them the esteem and confidence of their neighbours, already possesses 1,500 head of cattle and 180 horses. The colony has been greatly indebted to the Rev. H. Snow Pendleton, late British Chaplain at Montevideo, through whose constant friendship much of their worldly prosperity has been secured, and at whose urgent request a pastor and a schoolmaster were sent from La Tour, the latter of whom has been appointed alcaide, or magistrate of the district. Our only regret is that these evangelical Christians are so far from their native land, and that the island of Sardinia had not been ten years ago, as it is now, open for colonisation. But doubtless God has His own purpose with them in connexion with the evangelization of the South American Continent.

A BURIAL SERVICE INTERRUPTED—DR. DE SANCTIS—SIGNOR FERRETTI.

A singular interruption took place last week at the first burial service in the new Evangelical Cemetery of Leghorn. The law of Tuscany forbids—except in family vaults or the churchyards of foreigners—the sepulture of the dead in coffins, while the custom of the Waldenses is the same as our own. The keeper of the ground objected, and persisted in his refusal, despite all explanations as to the awkwardness. The Delegate of the town did the same, and could not be moved by remonstrance; so that the body was brought back and interred in the Swiss Cemetery. A representation has been made at Turin, where it is hoped this absurd restriction will be abolished.

The Amico di Casa, the popular evangelical almanac, edited by Dr. De Sanctis, is circulating far and wide, by tens of thousands. The variety and wonderful amount of information it contains merit a rapidly-increasing popularity. One of its articles, on the St. Januarius miracle, is making a stir in Naples, for many working men have been experimenting, according to the receipt given in the almanac, and have succeeded in making the blood boil; so we may expect a priestly agitation, and a good sale in that quarter.

I am happy to inform you that the large evangelical school established in Florence, more than a year ago, by Signor Ferretti, now an evangelist in the service of the Wesleyan Methodist Society, has been taken in hand by the Wesleyan Methodists, through their active missionary, Mr. Piggott, of Milan. I have no doubt that the new arrangements about to be introduced will render the school much more efficient than heretofore, and thus commend it more to the kindly interest of the friends of Christian education in Italy. Growing experience convinces us that nothing solid or durable will be accomplished unless the rising generation is trained in the evangelical faith.

GAVAZZI ON PROTESTANTISM.

I hope that none of my readers will listen for a moment to the rash and ignorant statements which Signor Gavazzi is unfortunately making at present. Why he should kindle a prejudice against Protestantism, which nobody is here seeking to diffuse, and against foreign agents in Italy, who have hitherto done all the preliminary work of circulating the Bible and supporting evangelistic effort, no one can understand. In the present dearth of native labourers, for whose training every effort is put forth, the lover of his country should welcome all who are willing to lend a helping hand. Though the number of Italian Aid Societies and labourers, both native and foreign, were quadrupled, it would fall far short of the present need; so that jealousy and evil speaking should have no place. The apostle was a foreigner when he preached with such success the Gospel in Rome, and all missionary experience in Italy proves that there is no such prejudice, as is pretended, against the reception of the truth from the lips of an earnest and godly stranger, except when excited by Plymouthism, itself an imported element, or fostered by inordinate vanity. No one has ever heard of any staff of agents whom Signor Gavazzi has at work, while foreign agents, instead of foolishly establishing their home organizations, are labouring to develop a thoroughly native ministry by all they do.

PROGRESS OF EVANGELIZATION.

The Elba churches prosper. It were wrong to omit grateful reference to the apostolic labour in the island, during the summer, of Mr. Chapman, a very old friend of the cause, who rejoices to spend his declining strength in edifying the assemblies of the saints. Mr. Chapman has seen a gratifying increase of membership at the various stations while he has been replacing Messrs. Marchand and Poccennini, absent for their final examinations and consecration to the work of the ministry. It is to this devoted octogenarian that the establishment of Bible-classes and other useful schemes is owing, and God has blessed his visit for the wider and deeper diffusion of earnestness, holy living and brotherly affection.

The Rev. Mr. Appia having accepted the call to the pastorate of the French Church in Naples, has left Palermo, to the regret of all who long to see something done for neglected Sicily. The small flock has made arrangements for carrying on public worship, care of the poor, Sunday-school, sewing society, &c., until a new pastor is sent, in God's providence, towards whose maintenance they agree to contribute according to their means. In Naples, the large assembly at San Tommaso d'Aquino, drawn together by Albarella, and ministered to by Perez, has unanimously resolved upon establishing the order of a Christian Church, and Messrs. Appia and Cresi have been invited to take the oversight of the charge. The Naples committee has also placed the hall at their disposition, and promised to continue its valuable support. As Mr. Appia will be so fully occupied with the French service, and both Marquis Cresi and Signor Perez have their own smaller assemblies and schools to attend to, it is probable that the evangelist, Peccennini, who has just gone from Elba to Naples, will relieve his Waldensian brother, Appia, of the duties at San Tommaso d'Aquino, where his preaching has been exceedingly acceptable for a few weeks past.

The Bible has been blessed to the perusal of a number of young men at Atezza, in the Abruzzi, whither the colporteurs have penetrated, at every risk, during the terrors of the whole brigandage period. These young men have formed themselves into an evangelical committee for spreading the light they have received, and anxiously desire, in very interesting letters, to have the counsel of a servant of God, and the benefit of a good evangelical library, which is now on its way to them.

An interesting extension of the labours of the Turin evangelist has just taken place, at a distance of eight miles from the capital, in the direction of the Alps. A member of Mr. Meille's congregation went thither, and was rejoiced to find "Sale of Bibles and Religious Books" in the window of a shop. This led to a small meeting of the few brethren in the place. The evangelist paid them a hurried visit, and baptized a child; and so rapid was the growth of the movement, that a small meeting-house was resorted to. For a month or two the priests have been busy anathematizing and persecuting, which has only served to increase the congregation. A larger hall has been obtained, to which many soldiers from the neighbouring camp come; and as ten heads of families have petitioned the Waldensian Committee of Evangelization, a regular visit will be paid each Sabbath to this newly-gathered flock.

INTERESTING CASE OF CONVERSION, ETC.— HELP FOR LANCASHIRE.

A case of conversion, followed by devotion to the Lord's service, has occurred in the Valley of Aosta, near Courmayeur, where a handful of Christians continue to brave the dire wrath of the priests. A young carpenter, in search of work, crossed the mountain, and was savingly impressed in the Canton de Vaud. Returning home to tell to his family what God had done for his soul, he was met with intreaties to renounce his heresy, and lay aside his constant companion, the Bible. The vicar and priest tried to persuade him he was unwell, and urged the drowning of his hideous notions in the brimming cup. The father threatened to disown him. All this, and much more, the young Christian bore with calm and inflexible purpose. Finally, to save the peace of the family, he has withdrawn, finds no difficulty in obtaining work, and holds meetings, in which he speaks to his comrades of Christ in a most tender and convincing way. The whole story having been talked of in the valley, there is no lack of auditors, and a large quantity of the Scriptures have been sold.

The Delegate of Morbegno, in the Valtellino, lately invited Mr. Turin, of Milan, whose evening school for adults is a great success, to come and preach the Gospel, and gave one of the rooms of his office for this purpose, without counting the cost. At the hour of meeting more than a hundred people assembled, and astonished everybody, not excepting the good Delegate, whose room was wholly insufficient to contain so many, and who had purposed only a quiet meeting of a few friends. The crowd was dispersed by the expedient of postponing the meeting till next day, before which time such a stir of priests and Government officials took place, that neither a hall could be had, nor could the peace be guaranteed by the authorities; so that the evangelist had to return to Milan without accomplishing his errand. Let us hope that better times will come, and that this is not the last we shall hear of the well-meaning Delegate or the good folks of Morbegno.

At Brescia, the burial of a young Protestant English woman, married to an officer of the Italian army, has taken place in the spot reserved for unbaptized infants and suicides, and has produced a very painful impression in the neighbourhood, most prejudicial to the evangelical movement.

A meeting was held in Florence last week of sympathy with the distressed operatives of Lancashire. The subscription list already reaches above 300*l*.

GERMANY.

Frankfort, November 15, 1862.

CONFLICT BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT AND THE SECOND CHAMBER IN PRUSSIA.

In a country where the Church, as in Germany, is in close connexion with the State, there is no political question which does not involve various religious interests, nor any religious question which practically does not everywhere touch political interests. The proof of both these propositions will be found in my present communication.

Who, in foreign countries, would think of finding religious interests mixed up with the sad and dangerous conflict which has arisen between the Prussian Government and Parliament? And yet thus it is. The politico-religious party, which the journals designate by the appellation "Feudal"—the party of the nobles, the higher class of the military, and many sincerely pious men—this party identifies its religious with its political principles, which, as you are aware, are those of absolute royalty. In the possession of power during the last, and having apparently fallen during the early part of the present reign, this party is in a fair way of conquering back all its influence, and the use that it is making of it cannot but appear very dangerous to all enlightened men. This is the party which, in its journals, openly preaches royal absolutism, which pours contempt upon the representatives of the nation, as if they formed no part of the constituted authorities, and which calls forth those demonstrations and deputations which come from different provinces, harangue the King, and endeavour to support him in the perilous course upon which his Government has entered. The last of these deputations was headed by a minister of religion! Thus it is that on all sides those imprudent speeches are delivered which only envenom the quarrel, by exciting political and religious passions, and by compromising at once both royalty and religion. Where are we to look for conciliatory sentiments when, upon one such occasion, the King spoke of the representatives of the nation as an opposition, which must be crushed, and of religion as a good, menaced by the liberal party, which he had undertaken to maintain! We do not here enter into the political question. But there is nothing more deplorable than the error which consists in making Christianity descend from its high and unconstrained spirituality, thus to be dragged in the arena of political passions. This is the most certain means of banding together and giving unity to all the elements of party hatred; and those who are responsible for the result have succeeded but too well, for the people en masse now see in every religious man a natural enemy to their liberties—so that the very men who sincerely imagine that they are fighting for their faith are, in fact, only propagating that enmity to Christianity which possesses such a frightful ascendancy over our populations. May God enlighten the blind on both sides, lead to the Gospel of Jesus Christ those who declare themselves His adversaries, and spare the nation the woes with which it is menaced!

THE SCHOOL QUESTION IN THE KIRCHENTAG ASSEMBLY.

We again find the unfortunate blending of political and religious interests in an important and difficult question, which was discussed at considerable length in the last Kirchentag at Brandenburg. My last letter informed your readers of the debates of this assembly on the relations of Church and State, and especially on the synodal reconstruction of the former. Now another question, inseparable from this, stood for discussion—that of the school. Over this institution—of such immense intellectual, moral, and national importance, since the next generation is moulded by it—no less than three powers share, or dispute, the authority: 1st. The State, which, after all, is its master; which appoints all the school-masters, prescribes all the regulations, and which, in a word, has absorbed the school along with the Church, to which the school primarily belongs. 2nd. The Church, which justly claims to exercise her influence over it, and which almost everywhere has a system of inspection in operation, by means of pastors. 3rd. The parish, which defrays all its expenses, and which has the most immediate right of control, since such right is no other than that of fathers over their children. To this must be added, that the liberal parties of the present day are exerting themselves, in all directions, to withdraw the school from beneath the influence of the Church, and that in this matter it is that the struggle is the most exciting, on the part of an irreligious generation, against clerical influences.

The committee of the Kirchentag hoped to throw some light upon this complicated question by admitting into its programme the following topic: "The Common School, in its Relation to the Entire Christian Community." This subject was treated in a manner which displayed much knowledge and talent by Professor Flashard, of Berlin, who sought to lay a basis for the discussion which was to follow, by assigning to each of the three authorities mentioned above the part which legitimately belongs to it. We cannot but decidedly approve of the spirit of this admirable address, in which the learned professor reasonably enough demanded confessional schools—that is to say, that each church should have schools of its own, and that in Protestant schools the predominant element of education should be the Bible. But it must be added, with regret, that neither he nor the speakers who followed him were able to solve the problem of the practice in future, for the simple reason that the three powers in question (the State, the Church, and the parish) are either in a false position, or are on the eve of undergoing a total transformation. All the religious, ecclesiastical, and political movements of our age, tend to this transformation; and the rightful place of the school can never be determined so long as the independence of the Church in relation to the State has yet to be achieved. And even then there is every reason to believe that the school will remain more and more exclusively in the hands of the State, and that the Church must seek to exert, by other means, its legitimate and powerful influence over infancy and youth. Be that as it may, the Kirchentag deserves the gratitude of all serious men for calling forth such a discussion upon this question—one of the most important and difficult at the present moment in Germany.

EFFORTS OF GERMAN CHRISTIANS ON BEHALF OF THE CHRISTIANS OF SYRIA.

It was really a mental recreation for the Brandenburg assembly, after the debates upon these perplexed questions, to listen to details, full of interest, upon the efforts of German Christians on behalf of the unfortunate remnants of the massacres of Syria. It may be recollected that the Kirchentag, at its previous meeting, at Barmen, appointed a committee, authorised to collect funds for this work of mercy. Professor Messner, of Berlin, reported that the contributions amounted to 60,771 thalers, of which there remains in hand 15,249 thalers. The committee proposed to the meeting that only the interest of this sum should be expended for the present, and that the principal should be held in reserve, in case, as is very probable, those horrible scenes should be repeated. This interest will be divided annually between the House for Orphans and Widows, founded by M. Fliedner, at Beyrout, where there are 128 children, and the Hospital of the Order of St. John, also established at Beyrout. Colonel Count von Bismark-Bohlen, of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, appeared in the tribune, and this spectacle of a solitary military uniform, amid the black coats of the pastors and savants, made a most agreeable impression upon the assembly. The colonel embraced that opportunity to remind his audience, that this is the order to which he belongs, and to give some details of his travels in Syria, in the interest of the work of his order. This order was founded among the nobles of Prussia, by the late King, with the view of establishing and supporting hospitals. When the cry of distress uttered by the Christians of Syria reached Europe, Prince Charles of Prussia, Grand Master of the Order, published an appeal on their behalf. A deputation of its members, of which the speaker formed part, was sent to Syria. They were accompanied by four nurses, men full of faith and charity, who had been trained in the establishment of Dr. Wichern, of Hamburg, and who took with them the requisite materials for fifty beds for the sick. The speaker described the horrible state of things which prevailed when they arrived at Beyrout, and the indefatigable activity which was even then displayed by the deaconesses who had been sent by M. Fliedner. Twelve hundred sick persons were brought together in a single house, the superintendent of which, M. Wichmann, died in the midst of his blessed work. Nothing could be more touching than to hear, from the mouth of the brave colonel, the eulogy of this simple-minded and devoted man, whose obsequies resembled those of a great personage. Not only did the Christians of Beyrout form themselves into a long funeral procession, but even the Pasha sent a detachment of Turkish troops as a guard of honour—an evident proof of the high esteem which had been won by this humble servant of God. The Hospital of the Order of St. John, at Beyrout, where 480 sick persons are lodged and cared for, exists at present only as a hired house; but steps have been taken to build a suitable edifice for it. "Let our hearts glow again for the Holy Land," said the speaker as he concluded; "our establishments are transplanting thither the faith and the manners of Germany. Christian charity everywhere must aid us in this good work." M. Disselhof, of Kaiserwerth, also sent into the East by Dr. Fliedner in the time of the great crisis, expressed to the meeting the gratitude of the Christians of Syria, and mentioned several facts full of interest respecting the House for Orphans at Beyrout, the difficulties of their education, and the struggles which they have had to maintain against the Jesuits, who endeavoured to snatch these poor children from beneath the influence of Evangelical Christians. M. Weber, the Prussian Consul, who, as a Christian, gives his utmost support to this benevolent enterprise, suggested the acquisition of a piece of ground, to secure a permanent existence to the Orphanage. M. Disselhof hesitated, when there arrived from St. Petersburg, in the most unexpected manner, a gift of 4,000 thalers, which was received as from the hand of God, and the ground was then purchased. The work thenceforth gained strength. The children showed themselves accessible to the teaching of Gospel truth, and to religious instruction generally. The Mohammedans are in astonishment when they hear the harmonious singing of Christian hymns, and their own parents look upon them as prodigies, when they see that they are able to read, write, &c. Dr. Fliedner has also founded, at Sidon, a hospital for women and children, in which 750 patients have been received in fourteen months. The speaker earnestly besought the assembly not to allow their charity to grow cool, but to support this institution to the utmost extent of their ability.

REMARKABLE CASE OF ECCLESIASTICAL OPPRESSION IN HANOVER.

From an old correspondent we have received the subjoined strange and distressing account of the state and doings of religious (?) parties in Hanover. The particular instance mentioned in this communication seems well worthy of being inquired into by British Protestants. If Lutherans and Papists combine to oust Reformation people and principles in the manner here described, it would be a good work, not merely for individual Christians, but for the Evangelical Alliance, to initiate some plan of resistance and of help to the cause of these distressed brethren. We shall be most happy to be the medium of such assistance :—

Shores of the Baltic, Nov. 3, 1862.

Although no longer enjoying the distinction of your "own correspondent," I have more than once been favourably received as an occasional one; and this emboldens me to seek the privilege now, with the view of interesting the readers of your far-spread and valuable magazine for the oppressed and threatened Reformed (or Calvinistic) Protestants in the kingdom of Hanover.

To you it is, I believe, no "new thing" to be certified of the war which High Churchism carries on against liberty of conscience in that country. But to many of your readers it may seem almost incredible, that under a Protestant Government, and amid a numerically greatly-preponderating Protestant population, the Church of Rome should be openly fostered and abetted, and the Church of Geneva systematically discouraged, held down, and to the best of their power uprooted, by the ultra-Lutheran party; a line of policy in which the highest ecclesiastical authorities in that land are not ashamed to take the lead. In proof, I beg attention to the following statement, published by the "Cœtus of the Reformed Preachers in East Friesland," and signed officially by the Moderators of their General Synod, the Pastors Trip and Bannenberg-Viëtor, August 5, 1862, at Emden, and entitled, "Cry for Help from the Reformed Congregation in Lengerich, near Lingen."

We learn from it that this Lengerich congregation owes its establishment, in common with its sister churches throughout the district of Lower Lingen, to the princely house of Orange-Nassau. In the year 1597 Prince Maurice, and in that of 1618 Prince William II., having possessed themselves fully of the whole county of Lingen, did then and there authorise and establish the Reformation in the hands of the still-existing congregations, and put them in possession of the churches, pastorages, and church-lands, which they still hold.

The before dominant Roman Catholic population strove, and still strive, with all their might against this, and have continually evinced, even to the present day, a bitter animosity to the Reformed, and have eagerly availed themselves of every contingency by which they might hope, either by force or fraud, to wrest the ecclesiastical buildings and other possessions from the Reformed. In this manner the congregation of Lengerich has had to sustain, during 250 years, a severe and ever-recurring conflict with a greatly-preponderating Roman Catholic population, which, in 1848, felt emboldened to such fanatic aggression as necessitated, for the protection of the Protestants, the infliction, by the then reigning monarch, Ernest Augustus, of a four months' quartering of troops on the Popish belligerents!

The fine old Gothic church, for two centuries and a half the pride and joy of the Reformed Protestants of Lengerich, situated in the middle of the village, with the parsonage on one side and the school-house on the other, is a venerable and imposing structure, whose massive stone walls, powerful buttresses, and sound oaken woodwork, bids fair to stand for centuries, as for centuries it has stood; but the tooth of time has made inroads on the roof, which call for repairs estimated to cost 1,869 thalers 10 gr. (or about 280*l.* sterling). Moreover, the parsonage is likewise in need of repair to the amount of some 1,600 thalers (or 240*l.* sterling), which sum, added to 1,000 thalers (or 150*l.*) already incurred for the recently-accomplished new building of the school-house, constitutes an actual and prospective debt of nearly 4,500 thalers (or 675*l.*); to meet which neither the current Church dues nor the private fortunes of the Church members, are at all competent.

But why, it will be naturally asked, do all this at once?

Why indeed, but because "an enemy is sowing tares?" Wherefore will be speedily shown.

The Royal architect who inspected the roof and estimated the expense declared its immediate outlay not necessary, but that it might well be accomplished in a course of years. In like manner an immediate repair of the parsonage is even undesirable, because the very aged incumbent has intreated that the proposed renovation might be mercifully postponed until he himself and his occupation of the premises should have expired; and, as if to end all difficulty, the Church members have professed their willingness to tax themselves to the amount of the partial repairs which may be deemed unpostponeable.

In such circumstances, you happy, independent English folks would have felt quite at ease, and looked forward with satisfaction to the progressive restoration of your church and parsonage. But not so your unhappy, fact-fettered co-religionists in Hanover. Their strange to say, the Reformed Church possesses no self-government, but is consigned, as regards all its temporalities, to the tender mercies of the Lutheran Consistories! And what these are (in our days of Ultramontaniam, when in many parts of Northern Germany the assimilation to Rome, in both heart and practice, is so close, that the only objection felt by most of the clergy to the Papal power is, that it is not wielded by one of them!) may be seen in the conduct of the Osnabruck Consistory, which, when a Royal architect declares all the repairs not immediately requisite, puts forth their authoritative sentence, that the funds at least must be all immediately provided, yet refuses all aid to the furnishing of them; and why? Because the Osnabruck Consistory desire to see the Reformed ousted from their fine old church, and the Roman Catholics reinstated in it! They make no secret of this wish, for in October, 1860, the Reformed of Lengerich were astounded by the arrival of Government Councillor Wyneken, a member of the Osnabruck Consistory, with an official recommendation to the congregation to sell their beloved and revered cathedral to those very Roman Catholics who have been their taunters and assailants for years long!

That such a proposition should find immediate acceptance was scarcely surmised, we may suppose, even by the proposers, and Councillor Wyneken had to return home with only the promise of a reply, which, after a full meeting of Church members, was forwarded to the Consistory, on the 12th of January, 1861, in the shape of a resolution, bearing that "the Reformed congregation could not, and would not, enter into any terms of sale with the Roman Catholics, but, on the contrary, were fully determined to maintain and uphold, in undiminished tale, every ecclesiastical possession they had inherited from their forefathers, and had therefore bound themselves to a voluntary contribution of 35 thalers per quarter; and had, moreover, determined on a special collection in aid of the church funds being made every Sunday after service."

On the 25th of April following the Consistory had the roof repairs estimated by a Royal architect, who gave them in, as before stated, at 1,869 thalers 10 gr., whereupon the Consistory, on the 31st of May, summoned the congregation to make up that sum; to which the harassed congregation responded that it could not forthwith furnish so large a sum, and must therefore apply for aid to brethren elsewhere. The Consistory rejoined, on the 21st July, that either the Reformed must make up their mind to sell the church, or make up the funds to repair it out of their own resources. But that, moreover, the Consistory felt bound not to conceal from the congregation that the highest Church authority might be driven to consider whether it might not consist with the true interest of the Reformed Church in Lengerich to compel it to sell its church, which compulsory measure would probably fall out less beneficially for the finances of the Reformed congregation, than the proposed voluntary relinquishment of the edifice! This was taking ultra high ground with a vengeance. And although, doubtless, the legality of such a compulsory sale would be open to after trial, still the effect hoped from the threat, as well as the Romish bias which impelled it, are abundantly transparent.

The answer of the Lengerich congregation followed on the 15th of August, 1861, to the effect that if the Royal Consistory would graciously sanction—in other words, appoint—a collection in their aid, the congregation would engage, and in its name the present presbytery (consisting of four landed proprietors of more or less extent of property) would pledge themselves, and all they possessed, to the furnishing of whatever balance might be requisite in addition to the products of said collection.

As to this humble petition and self-sacrificing offer no answer had arrived on the 1st of May, 1862, the Church Presbytery again solicited, and at length, on the 5th of June, obtained a reply in the negative, and at the same time the announcement that a commission, composed of two members of the Royal Landdrosthei (or bailiwick), one member of the Lutheran, and one of the Roman Catholic Consistory,* would shortly be nominated, to recommence negotiations for the purchase of the church by the Roman Catholics, and to weigh the "very considerable bid made by that community for the building." On the 7th of June the nomination actually took place, and on the 18th the commission, who assuredly cannot be accused of sleeping on their post, had already appointed the 30th of the same month as the term on which the locality was to be inspected, and the negotiations regarding the sale to the Catholics put into course of progress.

In this extremity (by which it was plain that the Lutherans and Papists were in league to oust the Reformed, and reciprocally to buy and sell what belonged to neither) the Reformed congregations hastened to certify to the Consistory that, "in exact accordance with their communicated resolution of January, 1861, they would not enter into any negotiation whatsoever for the sale of their church; a resolution in which they were the more justified by the last and highest offer made by the Roman Catholics, of 13,000 thalers, for an edifice whose intrinsic worth is from 80,000 to 100,000;" an offer which assuredly scarcely deserves to be designated as one highly worthy of consideration.

Since this resolution was forwarded to the Royal Consistory, on the 18th of July last, no further steps have been taken, except that the above-named commission, saw fit, in direct opposition to the expressed will of the congregation, to carry out the proposed local inspection, on the thereto-appointed day. But although nothing further had been done, Councillor Wyneken has not hesitated to declare that the Consistory is determined to sift out and ascertain the financial necessities of the Reformed Church, whereupon to found a renewal of the attempt to gain the church at Lengerich for the Roman Catholics! To this reverend gentleman's repeated query, how the Reformed expected to meet the repair demands, he as regularly received the reply, "By devoting all we possess to it, if necessary." And to this the Osnabruck Consistory will bring those poor people, if no foreign aid be obtained, for it will hear of no successive repairs—no instalment payments! Shylock's pound of flesh must be laid down at once. The Consistory wills the expulsion of the Reformed eyesore; so no mitigation or alleviation of their difficulties will be consented to. In this pitiable state, cut off from all help at home (because with the Consistory rests the power of authorising a collection, and it has refused to exercise that power), the Reformed Churches of East Friesland have sent forth their "Cry for Help" into other portions of the Fatherland.

The copy now before me was sent to Lubeck, and in the Reformed Church of that city a collection in aid was made last Sunday. But the Reformed are not numerous in Lubeck; and although, doubtless, individual Lutherans may add their help, no Lutheran Church or pastor will contribute, for, alas, Papists are really—and often avowedly—nearer and dearer to Lutherans than the Reformed! Will not British Christians do something for these oppressed and persecuted ones? "To their power, aye, above their power," they are eager to relieve their own necessities, and avoid being a burthen on others; but impossibilities cannot be mastered! Shall, then, the tyrannous, imperious, Consistory have its way? Shall the taunting, sneering Romanists drive out, and that by the help of "false brethren," the Reformed from their cherished church, and glory in their defeat? Shall liberty of conscience be rode over, roughshod, by party intolerance, and cabal triumph over honest, because poor, conviction? Fain would I hear the response, "That be far from us!" from English lips; for though Germany may do somewhat, I have much more reliance on England, where the right of private opinion is both appreciated and exercised, in a degree of which the Continent has absolutely no conception! So that, if this appeal find a place in Evangelical Christendom, I feel almost sure it will not plead in vain! and therefore can hereto add that I am ready and willing to be, as often heretofore, the channel of your bounty, and can easily ensure its safe transmission, through Pastor Deiss, of the Reformed Church in Lubeck. I would add one monitory word, "to be done well, 'twere well it were done quickly!" lest the watchful Consistory come down upon us with un fait accompli, which, though the undoing thereof might be possible, would be precarious, and at all events both protracted and expensive.

DENMARK.

MISSIONARY ANNIVERSARY AT RIBE.

The missionary movement in Denmark makes steady progress. Two years ago we had the first of our great missionary meetings from the whole country at Nyborg (Evangelical Christendom, vol. ix., p. 36). Last year we were assembled at Aarhus, where about one-tenth of the Danish clergy was present; this year at Ribe. And though this city is situated in a corner of the kingdom, and in a thinly-populated country, yet from 1,000 to 2,000 persons, even from distant provinces, were assembled. The missionary conference was opened and terminated by a service in the cathedral, one of the noblest monuments of mediæval architecture in Denmark, at which the Bishop of Ribe, Mr. Daugaard, and the rural dean, Blødel, preached. Three conferences were held in a hall in this city, and the attendance was larger at the second than the first, and at the third the largest of all. The President of our Missionary Society, Dr. Kalkar, presented the report. Most of the minor missionary societies have attached themselves to the mother societies, and deputies of several of them were present. The chief field of the Danish Missionary Society is Greenland. Unhappily, the Greenlanders have acquired a taste for several European luxuries, especially coffee; and being like children as to the future, they secure no provisions for that part of the year when they are not to be obtained, and thus they often run the risk of starvation. In this condition they rely for help upon the Danes, and this contributes to make them the more careless; yet their civilisation goes onward. Municipalities have been introduced in Greenland, and Greenlanders now learn, under the guidance of the Government, to manage, to some extent, their own affairs. A printing-office has been established at Gothaab, and several books have been printed, illustrated with wood-engravings executed by the natives. As to the spiritual interests of Greenland, it has had, for nearly twenty years, two seminaries, where natives are educated as catechists. Now, when all the Greenlanders have been baptized, there is a growing wish amongst the Danish friends of missions that they may have native pastors. The catechists already perform most of the ministerial duties. They conduct the daily services, morning and evening; they preach at the numerous out-stations, they baptize the children, instruct the catechumens for confirmation, and speak at the funerals. But some of our missionaries think that the time has not yet come for ordaining the natives, who, they say, are too little inclined to be governed by their countrymen, &c. The Missionary Society has therefore requested the Government to send an able man to Greenland to visit the missions, and it has deferred passing any resolution as to the ordination of the natives until this gentleman shall have returned and expressed his opinion on the matter. Besides the Greenlanders in the colonies, there are also others, both northwards and eastwards, and the society hopes one day to send missionaries to them. Already a Danish catechist has prepared to go and preach the Gospel to the East Greenlanders. A missionary seminary has this year been opened at Copenhagen with five students, all of whom are peasants.

HOME MISSIONARY EFFORTS

As to home missions, a little society, chiefly consisting of peasants, was formed about ten years ago at Sjøland. It has recently declared that though its principal aim is to send out lay preachers, yet as no such are to be had, they will employ colporteurs. This year another little home missionary society was founded by pious clergymen and peasants south of Aalborg. A few months ago I attended one of their meetings. From 1,000 to 2,000 men and women, for the most part peasants, were assembled in the open air in a wood, and several hours were spent in singing religious hymns and listening to the addresses of three pastors and two laymen. I believe that this society also intends to send out colporteurs with religious books and tracts—an agency which is much needed amongst us. The Tract Society does not yet employ colporteurs, but supplies the colporteurs of several pastors with tracts. It published last year sixteen new and two older tracts (100,000 copies and 138,250 sheets); 1860, the third year of existence, 89,000 copies and 138,250 sheets. The Bible Society circulated last year 1,700 Bibles and 5,019 New Testaments; the agency of the British and Foreign Bible Society 11,978 New Testaments. In all, 4,000 more copies were circulated last year than the year before.

PAYMENT OF THE CLERGY.

Several times I have reported on the discussions of the Diet and the landmodes on ecclesiastical subjects. This year a question has arisen respecting the payment of the clergy. The radical party wishes the clergy to obtain a fixed salary, in order that the tithes (or rather one-third tithes) of the clergy may thus be regarded as the property of the State. The Minister of Worship, acting under political pressure, has several times prepared bills on this question; but as he wishes the tithes to be regarded as the property of the Church, no agreement has hitherto been possible. This year he has elaborated a new bill, and has sent it to the clergy, and requested the opinion of the clergy assembled in the rural deaneries thereon. The question has also been discussed by the landmodes, and they all preferred to retain the old usage, partly because the interests of the Church were not sufficiently guaranteed by the bill, partly because all its provisions were not to be recommended.

THE PRINCESS ALEXANDRA.

And now I am about to terminate these remarks, I cannot forbear speaking on a question that in these days is uppermost in the thoughts of Danes, when they think of England, and I dare say also in the thoughts of Englishmen, when they hear of Denmark. I refer to the intended marriage between the Prince of Wales and our Princess. On this question but one voice is to be heard amongst us—that of hearty joy. But when almost all rejoice on political grounds, certainly also they are to be found who rejoice on other grounds—who feel that in religious matters we have much to learn from England. May the Lord bless this union to the young couple of both realms, and to us all, that here also it may be seen that He holds all things in His hand, and makes all to conduce to the furtherance of His kingdom.

SWEDEN.

Jonkoping, November, 1862.

THE RELIGIOUS REVIVAL.

In few countries are revivals going on so quietly, and at the same time steadily, as here—partly on account of the national character, partly because it is a growth from long teaching and many silent prayers amongst the town clergy in bygone days. Our people are fond of their Church, and with the exception of some parts of Smaland, and a few places here and there, the number of Dissenters is not numerous. All the good clergymen and pious people hope and pray for a reformation, a removal of abuses, and are not for leaving the State Church. A good deal has been done already, and more is hoped for at the Diet which is now begun. A political change is looked forward to by which the clergy would not have, as at present, parliamentary representatives of their own; but somehow, the higher clergy will manage to get a word said in the matter, and are not likely to give up completely their old privileges.

THE STRUGGLE AGAINST INFIDELITY: CHRISTIAN EFFORT AMONG THE PEASANTRY.

The conflict between infidelity, or "enlightened

Christianity," and the "one-sided," and so-called "prejudiced," Bible Christians, is also going on here. Dr. Wiesclyn, in Gothenburg, is trying to defend the Church there against the new lights that Antichrist is trying to introduce amongst the people, and a still more violent contest will, no doubt, arise a few years hence. In the meantime, all true Christians are working to spread the pure Word of God. Schools for teachers, clergymen and missionaries are established, the Evangelical National Union is sending out a number of colporteurs, who sell and give away Bibles, the works of Luther, and tracts, original and translated; all over the land Missionary Unions, which work and pray for missions, have been formed. In our province of Smaland, of which Jonkoping is the principal town, many such unions have sprung up amongst the peasants, and it truly humbles us to see how much can be effected with small means, where there is earnest good-will! For instance, one woman devotes a day to spin for missions; in time, another, and then another; one washes the whole, or bleaches it; and, at last, through the united efforts of many poor persons, a large piece of linen is got ready for sale. Part of the money is kept for buying new materials, and the rest sent to the Evangelical National Union. Our little union keeps a school at Lebanon, and helps to pay one colporteur in Italy, and three at home, who labour in this neighbourhood.

HOMES FOR TEACHERS AND ORPHANS.

Pastor Ablony's mission-school for teachers and young orphans is progressing, but there is another home that is rather interesting, and of which something might be told. It is in the parish of Aleskeda, near the village of Skede, a house of no grand dimensions, and very simple construction. There seventy girls are brought up, at very little expense indeed, upon the simplest fare. Two women of the peasant class are at the head of the household—the one superintends the sewing, spinning, weaving, and the reading; the other cooks, washes, &c., and the children themselves help her. The orphan home does not contain more than four rooms. Four peasants manage the business of the house; one has the accounts, another the correspondence, a third has the charge of the land belonging to the home, and which mainly provides their sustenance, and so on. They meet every month, when the curate of the parish, Pastor Regbuy, presides.

All the affairs of the establishment are thus gone through, the children catechised and examined, and prayer-meetings held, when all the people around crowd to the place. Last year was one of great need. Some details from a record kept in the house may perhaps be of interest: "In January, at the monthly meeting, bills must be paid to the amount of 800 rix-dollars (15*l.*), and there was no corn in the barn, and no bread to fill forty hungry stomachs, and eight months to the harvest. The price of the rye was 20 rix-dollars for a barrel (tunna). The head director (Pastor Regbuy) then told the servants and children to fall down on their knees, and call upon the Lord, who feeds the raven's young. At first we prayed for a word of promise to strengthen us during prayer. The Bible was opened, and our eyes fell upon John xiv. 14—18. These blessed words went home to all, and with great power and assurance we could lay hold on it. On the 13th of January the home got 20 barrels of corn, 136 of potatoes, not to mention peas, flax, malt, flour, meat, and 77 rix-dollars. In February the director had the great joy to tell the assembled friends of the home that the Lord had heard the first part of our prayer, and given us corn. Now we were sure He would also hear the remainder of our petition, and give us money to pay our debts. The 10th of February 20 rix-dollars were sent, and we took them as a seal to the promise of Jesus, 'Ask, and it shall be given.' On another occasion the potatoes were at an end; it was Christmas-eve, and we had not a potato to give the little ones. These all fell down, after having sung their hymns round the Christmas-tree, and asked God to give them potatoes. After prayer, one girl said to the matron, 'May we not go down into the cellar and look out if none are found there?' 'Oh, no, of what's the use? everything there is swept, and not a thing to be seen.' 'Please let us go?' 'Well, do it,' and down some children went, and to the exceeding astonishment and joy of the whole house, came up with a large bag, enough for the holidays. It was like a miracle of old. Nobody knew how the potatoes came there. As it was, they were the gift of God."

Much more of the same kind might be told, but we are afraid of making these wonderful things a topic of speculation. God's miracles are not at an end, however, and He is present amongst his children there, and hears their cries of faith, as in the days of old.

AMERICA.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS.

Albany, New York, Oct. 31, 1862.

It was very pleasant for us to retire from the din and strife occasioned by the civil war existing in the Southern part of our land to the holy quiet and the sweet fraternal intercourse which prevailed at the late annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. And it was very evident that not a few were disposed to enjoy this retirement and pleasur-

The meeting was held, according to appointment, in Springfield, Massachusetts, which is about midway between Boston and this city. The weather was propitious, and the smiles of Providence were every way enjoyed. The sessions commenced on Tuesday, October 7th, at four o'clock P.M., under the presidency of the Rev. Dr. Hopkins, of Williams College. That evening the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Smith, of Buffalo, from John xvii. 20, 21. It was elaborate and powerful, and heard with attention and interest.

On Wednesday morning crowded prayer-meetings were held in different churches from half-past eight to half-past nine o'clock, after which the annual and special reports were presented. The Treasurer stated that the entire income for the year had been 339,080 dollars. Owing to retrenchments by the missionaries, and donations made directly to them by English friends, the expenditures amounted to only 322,298 dollars. The year began with a debt of 27,885 dollars, and closed with a debt of 11,103 dollars.

The state of the several missions is encouraging. To the two churches connected with those in Southern and Western Africa thirty-two persons have been added. Church members have been quickened and revived, and the body of converts, all lately barbarous, have contributed 750 dollars for the support of native home missionaries. The missions to Western, Central, and Eastern Turkey may properly be described as one large mission. There are 21 stations, 84 out-stations, 40 missionaries, 44 authorised native preachers (of whom 11 are pastors), and 125 other native co-labourers. Of churches there are 43, with 1,564 members; almost 200 of whom were received the past year. 117 common schools contain 3,500 pupils; and there are three high schools for training a native ministry. These missions have been greatly afflicted during the year by the sudden, and even violent, death of several of their prominent members.

The Syrian Mission, though suffering for want of labourers, was never so promising as now. Urgent appeals for religious teachers are constantly made to the missionaries. More persons have avowed themselves Protestants the last twelve months than during the whole previous forty years. Considerable additions were made to several churches. A home missionary spirit was prevalent. Many were inquiring on the subject of religion. 5,000 copies of a pocket edition of the New Testament were speedily distributed; and Dr. Van Dyck is energetically preparing his Arabic version of the Old Testament.

The Nestorian Mission has also suffered from sickness and death during the year; still the work of God has advanced. There has been in the seminaries a revival of religion. Sixty-two persons were added to the Church. The number in communion is now about five hundred. The pledges of Christian liberality, lately made, had been fulfilled, and the theological class of fifteen are all pledged to become preachers of the Gospel. There is also cheering evidence of spiritual progress among the Mohammedans in Persia.

The Missions in India are in a prosperous state. Four new churches were formed among the Mahrattas, and eighty-five new converts received to fellowship. To the church at the Madras Mission there was an accession of eleven members. To the twenty-eight churches connected with the Madura Mission ninety-four were added, and these have enjoyed direct proof of the special presence of the Holy Spirit. The Ceylon Mission has ten churches, containing 439 members, and they had an addition last year of forty-three. In all these missions there are encouraging indications of benevolence among the native Christians.

The three China Missions have been both afflicted and blessed. The death of Dr. Bridgman is severely felt. To the church at Fuh-chau six members were added, and the missionaries had unusual encouragement.

At the Sandwich Islands the schools, the high seminary and the Oahu College, are in a prosperous state. The number of members reported in the churches, at the close of 1861, was 20,000, and the contributions of the native Christians for the support and promotion of the Gospel, exclusive of labour on their meeting houses, was about 18,000 dols. Ten young men were licensed to preach the Gospel.

The following is the annual summary of the whole:—

Central missions, 20; stations, 110; out-stations, 196.

Missionaries, 144, with 180 American male and female assistants.

Native pastors, teachers, and helpers, 751.

Total number of labourers, 1,075.

Churches, 174; members, 25,063; added last year, 1,263.

Pupils in seminaries, boarding, and free schools, 8,439; printing establishments, 3; pages printed last year, 10,229,200.

This summary presents gratifying proof that the hand of God has been with His servants, and blessed their labours.

After hearing the annual report, and putting its several parts in the hands of special committees to examine, the Board listened to two very able papers, the first from the Rev. Dr. Anderson, Foreign Secretary, on "The Native Pastorate, an Essential Means of Procuring a Native Ministry;" the second, from the Rev. Dr. Bacon, of New Haven, on "The Expenditures and Finances of the Board." The latter gave a complete view of the internal and detailed operations of the officers, executive committee and agencies, and was received with great satisfaction. I would cheerfully present a synopsis of these documents, but the limits of this communication will not allow it.

Various resolutions and able speeches followed these reports, and it was delightful to mark the absorbing interest, the harmony of feeling and sentiment, and the spirit of activity and aggressiveness which characterised the whole. The members were evidently gladdened in heart, and determined, with gratitude to God, to go forward in the great work to which He had called them.

The following are among the resolutions passed:—

Resolved,—That we humbly and gratefully recognise the good hand of our God upon us during the past year, in saving our missions from disastrous curtailment, and our finances from serious perplexity; so that, pending a civil war of gigantic and ever-growing dimensions, by placing unexpected gains in one quarter against unexpected losses in another, He has taught us how easy it is for Him, according to His own good pleasure, to "open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys."

Resolved,—That the thanks of this Board are hereby cordially tendered to the several associations of friends in Great Britain and its dependencies, who have contributed spontaneously no inconsiderable amount in aid of the American Missions in Turkey. That these contributions deserve a peculiar regard, as intended to express the confidence which is felt by intelligent observers in the character of our missionaries in the East, and the wisdom with which they have conducted the delicate and difficult service with which they are entrusted, and especially as indicative of a magnanimous attachment to that kingdom of the Redeemer, the unity and glory of which are superior to all the casual and extrinsic distinctions of sect, and nation, and country; and that we hereby express our satisfaction at every sign of a more decided co-operation among all who speak the English tongue, for the extension of the Gospel, as our common inheritance, and the only sure presage of liberty, order, good government, and happy civilisation, throughout the whole earth.

Apprehensions were felt by some persons that, in consequence of the state of the country, the attendance at the meeting would not be as large as usual. But these were fallacious. There were present eighty-six corporate, and 464 honorary members, and altogether near 3,000 visitors. No church was large enough to accommodate the audience; consequently, the business meetings were held in the large City Hall, and a church close by was kept open at the hours for missionary addresses. On Thursday afternoon the three Congregational churches of the city were insufficient to accommodate those who assembled to commemorate the death of Christ; consequently, a fourth assembly was gathered in the City Hall.

As might be expected, the members and friends of the Board could not, on this occasion, be silent respecting the unrighteous rebellion which exists in this land. They solemnly and unanimously expressed their view of it, and its tendency as affecting the interests of foreign missions, in minute, the spirit of which will be seen from its concluding sentence:—

With our renewed prayer to the God whose displeasure at the wickedness which fills the earth with sadness and oppression, all history has testified, and who so often wrought deliverance for our fathers in their perils, we record our grateful confidence that the rebellion will be crushed, that slavery, its prime cause, will be removed, and that peace, prosperity and righteousness will be permanently established in our land.

The closing meeting was held on Friday morning, from half-past eight till eleven o'clock, and was tender and impressive in a high degree. D. D.

CHINA.

APPEALS FROM THE CHINESE MISSION FIELD.

An experienced missionary of the American Board, engaged in the laborious work of preaching the Gospel among the Chinese, writes us from Fuh-chau as follows:—

Will you grant me a column in which briefly to solicit an enlarged interest in the missionary work in China, on the part of those Western Christians who are visited regularly by your periodical? It seems to many of those who are labouring for the spread of Christianity among the Chinese that there is far too little interest taken in this empire, and far too little fervent prayer offered in behalf of this people on the part of our friends in England and in America.

As is well known in all the Christian world, God, in answer to the prayers of His people, has made several new and large fields of labour in China, legally accessible to His missionary servants, within three years past. But the writer has not heard of a single Protestant missionary having been sent out from any of the twenty-four different missionary societies which have representatives in this land designed and appointed to proceed at once to the work at any of the new ports. The new port in the extreme south of China, and that on the Island of Formosa, and two or three situated in the northern part of the empire, or on the Yangtze, remain still unsupplied. The missionaries who have gone to other of the new ports have left their previous fields of labour in order to do it. Some of them have even been constrained to study a new dialect, in order to qualify themselves to go and occupy the new ports.

Instead of the number of missionaries in China being largely augmented, in view of the calls of God's providence, it does not even appear to be greater than it was some six or eight years ago. In 1855 the number of labourers actually employed in the field was eighty-six, and seven were temporarily absent, on account of health or other reasons. In 1858 eighty-seven were present, and twenty-three were reported as absent. According to the most accurate information the writer could obtain, a few months ago there were only from about seventy-eight to eighty-five Protestant missionaries engaged at some ten different consular ports, in some seven different provinces. Surely the work in China is not prosecuted as actively and as zealously as God's providence seems to demand. Foreign commerce is carried on with restless energy at the new as well as at the old ports, while the missionary cause, so far as represented by the number of its foreign agents, does not appear to have received any special impetus during the few years past. Is this as it should be?

Doubtless, a few English and American firms employ many more agents in selling a pernicious and poisonous drug in China, for the sake of the pecuniary profits of the trade, than all the missionary societies in Christendom employ missionaries in this land in the holy work of teaching the deluded heathen the way of salvation by Jesus; and there is, doubtless, much more money made annually by those few firms by the sale of opium in this empire than is expended by English and American Christians in the prosecution of the missionary work here. Are not the children of darkness wiser in their generation than are the children of light?

Let Western Christians be incited also to a greater interest and sympathy in the missionary work in China, and to more frequent and effectual prayer for the Divine blessing to rest upon efforts for the conversion of the Chinese, by a view of the magnitude of the enterprise and the slow progress of the work. During the fifty-four years which have elapsed since the arrival of Dr. Morrison at Canton there have been at least 1,600 years of foreign missionary labour in the aggregate spent among the Chinese in Eastern Asia. There have been, doubtless, some thousands of millions of pages of Scripture and of Christian truth published in the general language of the empire and in several local dialects. And doubtless there has been expended during these fifty-four years several millions of dollars in connexion with the work in this land. Yet, at the present time, there are probably not many over 2,000 living converts to Christianity in all this vast and most populous empire, and very few of these are from the wealthy and influential classes of society. In the providence of God only a small portion of the seaboard and a few out of the many populous cities situated in the maritime provinces have been the scenes of the labours of the foreign missionary, while the immense and densely-populated interior of the empire has been unvisited by the Gospel messenger. Doubtless much of the Christian literature, and many of the New Testaments designed for distribution in the interior, or remote from the centres where missionaries have been permitted to reside and labour.

have failed of reaching their destination, and the wishes of the Christian friends of the heathen Chinese living in the distant provinces or cities have been thereby thwarted. Probably, nay, without a reasonable doubt, there are several scores of millions of adult Chinese living in the western provinces who have never seen a single page of Scripture nor a single page of a Scripture tract, or who have not even so much as heard of the labours of Protestant missionaries along the seaboard and in the few widely-separated consular ports.

At this rate of progress how long will it require for the evangelization of China! How many thousands, and even tens of thousands of millions, of priceless souls must perish from this single empire without a knowledge of the Saviour! May British and all Western Christians be incited to pray more earnestly for the salvation of China, and may they be led to prosecute the work of teaching its hundreds of millions the way to heaven with far greater zeal and efficiency!—Very sincerely, AN AMERICAN MISSIONARY.

An appeal somewhat similar to the above also reaches us from Sharghai. The writer in this case, too, is a missionary. We have only space for a few sentences, but these are of weighty import:—

It is an entirely mistaken idea which pervades the Christian mind, that the Gospel has but to be presented to the heathen, and the wondrous tale of the cross preached within their hearing, to produce an instantaneous effect upon their minds. Such effects are rarely, if ever, met with. It must not be forgotten that the people we have to deal with have for centuries been accustomed to the grossest superstitions; inasmuch, that when the true God is proclaimed, and His doctrines set forth, it takes some considerable time for them to comprehend what is the nature of the religion which is urged upon their acceptance. What is essentially requisite for the spread of the Gospel is an intelligent interest in the work of missions; such an interest as will be prepared to cope with difficulties, and to provide against all contingencies that may arise in the prosecution of the work. . . . So long as Christians are moved merely by mere impulse, nothing great can be accomplished. It is by hearty co-operation, and an appreciation of the labour involved in an attack upon the strongholds of Satan, that steady progress is to be made.

JAPAN.

PROTESTANT PROSPECTS AND ROMISH DEVICES.

Nagasaki, June 20, 1862.

In addition to the remarks made in my last letter upon the prospects of Christianity in Japan, I am able to send you a few facts bearing upon this subject, which are the results of observation and inquiry.

It is only about three years since Protestant missionaries came to this country, and yet within that short period such a change has already come over the people as augurs well for the future history of Christian missions. The missionaries upon their first arrival, and, indeed, for some considerable time after, found the Japanese altogether unwilling to converse about Christianity. The subject was no sooner broached than, with a terrified appearance, they at once changed it for one less dangerous. They intimated that the subject was prohibited in Japan, and, by a significant drawing of the hand across the throat, silently intimated the punishment attending the infraction of the law. This feeling was not confined to the common people merely. It was manifested also by men of standing and authority. It was only when alone, and secure from the presence of any of their countrymen, that they would dare to hazard a remark upon religious topics. It is gratifying to find, however, that the Japanese no longer display any signs of fear when religion is mentioned. Remarks are now made, and questions asked with the greatest freedom, utterly astounding to one who has read the edicts of former times. How it is that so great a change has come about in so short a time may be accounted for from the fact that Christianity is now better understood. As I stated in my last, the Government had taken such effectual measures to eradicate the teachings of the Jesuits out of the land, that the very mention of Christianity was sufficient to excite a feeling of horror in the mind of every loyal Japanese. It was associated only with treason and rebellion. Its sole aim was represented to be the overthrow of the constituted authorities, and the enslaving of the people. Christianity was, in fact, looked upon as something political, not religious, and, consequently, it was regarded with the u!most abhorrence. Intercourse, however, with foreigners is gradually removing these prejudices. The presence, moreover, of missionaries, and the distribution of religious books, are also exerting their influence. A good number of Bibles have been given away, and applications are frequently made for the sacred volume. That they read the Bible is evident from their ability to give an account of its contents. There is not the slightest doubt that if there were no restrictions to the public preaching, and to the reception of the Gospel, Christianity would have great success amongst the people. This is the opinion of the missionaries resident here. There is one great power, however, in Japan, which will always be opposed to Christianity, and that is the priesthood. In Nagasaki alone there are nearly a hundred temples; and when we consider the number of priests attached to each, and the thousands of temples that are scattered over the land, we may have some conception of the immense multitudes of priests that throng the land. For some time the priests in Nagasaki were on friendly terms with the missionaries, but when they found that the doctrines of Christianity were so decidedly opposed to their own system, they kept aloof from them, and have continued to do so.

The Roman Catholics have already returned to the scene of their early triumphs. They have built a large church in Yeddo, and are using every means to insinuate themselves. It is said they have adopted the plan of lending money to aristocratic, but needy Japanese. They thus obtain a hold upon them, which there is little doubt they will use for the accomplishment of their own purposes. Notwithstanding all these obstacles, which appear so great to the human mind, the truth of God will prevail. Human systems may for a time erect a barrier which seems formidable, but the impetus of Christianity no sooner comes in contact with it, than every vestige is swept away, leaving not a trace behind.

POLYNESIA.

POPIISH AGGRESSION IN THE NAVIGATORS' ISLANDS.

Mission House, Safotulafai, Savaii,
Samoa, July 12, 1862.

THE PRIESTS' APPEAL TO THE SENSES, AND EMPLOYMENT OF LAY AGENCY.

Perhaps a few remarks on the movements of the "emissaries of the Man of Sin" in the Navigators' Islands may not be uninteresting to some of your readers. There are some thirteen European agents, assisted by a staff of native agents. They have confined their operations to Savaii and Upolu, the two largest islands in the group. The port of Apia, Upolu, is their head-quarters. There they have erected a costly edifice, which quite ousts all our native-built chapels in the shade. This was a master stroke of policy; it gives them a local standing and importance, and goes a long way as an attraction to the natives, who are intensely fond of sight-seeing, show, and ceremony. It tends to elevate them above us in a Samoan's idea. The priests have been compelled to take a leaf out of our modus operandi with regard to employing native teachers. There are, I believe, upwards of 200 villages on the two islands. They are now adopting our machinery—married native teachers and preachers. These men conduct the regular services of the chapels, and the priest goes by turn to each of his villages. I suppose the priests found celibacy would not suit the Samoans, and were glad to stretch a point.

MARIOLATRY AND IMMORALITY.

It has been rumoured for months past that the bishop is about to remove his residence from Wallis Island to Upolu, and that a mission seminary, on the principle of our Malua Institution, is to be at once set on foot for the drilling of an efficient staff of lay native married agents. I am told by trustworthy parties that the ground for the seminary has been bought. So it would seem that great efforts are soon to be made to Romanise Samoa.

The priests labouring in this group belong to the "Society of the Sacred Heart of Mary." Mary is the supreme object of worship with them, and her glories the great theme of their preaching and teaching. Our people who have and know the Word of God have no difficulty in seeing that Mariolatry is opposed to the spirit and letter of that Word. A Samoan Christian, with his open Bible, is more than a match for the subtle Jesuit any day. As long as we have an open Bible freely circulated amongst the people, and are free to publish its glorious contents, we have nothing to fear. This is all we ask in our hand to hand struggle with the "Papal Antichrist." Well do the priests know—yes, and feel—that an open Bible is an impregnable barrier to the progress of Mariolatry. Past experience has taught the priests that truth. With such a staff of men they have made contemptible progress. They are galled at this. Much would they like to try other weapons than the tongue can furnish. Hitherto they have carried on their crusade with an awful amount of lying and wickedness. They stick at nothing by which to make a proselyte—sanction adultery, Sabbath desecration, and pander with the crying vice of the South Sea Islands, immorality—in order to increase their numbers.

SCHEME OF THE PRIESTS TO SECURE A FRENCH "PROTECTORATE."

Within the last few weeks rather portentous events have transpired. About the 20th of June a French man-of-war, from Tahiti, made its appearance at Apia, Upolu. Nobody knew its errand. Suspicion, if not alarm, was awakened. But the "cat was let out of the bag" on the 2nd inst. On that day a native Fono, or Parliament, was held. It was got up by the priests. Their tool is a chief named Mana, a renegade teacher of ours, who went over to them some time ago. He got a divorce from the priests from his wife, and has been recently married by the priest to another woman! Being a man of considerable importance and authority, Mana was a fine catch to the priests. He is a principal orator in the Parliament, and through him the meeting was got up. The priests, with the captain of the French man-of-war, were present. It was, I believe, a select Parliament of the principal chiefs.

Well, what do you think was the object of the meeting? To induce the chiefs to accept a French protectorate. For some months past we have been living in almost daily expectation of seeing the "Napoleon of the Pacific," King George of Tonga, with his legions. He has threatened war against Samoa, on account of the death of a Tongau, at Suimu-Upolu. He first demanded Samoa to deliver up the murderer to him. The chiefs refused to comply, because they consider that the man was not murdered, but killed in war. He had no business, they said, to take part in the fight, then he would not have been killed. The ire of his Tongan majesty was enkindled, and he vowed speedy vengeance on Samoa. This event has thrown Samoa into a state of great excitement; the chiefs are all at sixes and sevens; union seems to be impossible. They must have a supreme head before they can unite even for self-defence, I fear. We have a host of petty rulers in Samoa, who divide the people into a thousand tribes, and are ever getting into hot water with each other. The chiefs of course embroil the people. They are full of jealousy towards each other, and their rival interests are ever setting them by the ears. This is a source of quarrels ad infinitum. I expect whilst our chiefs are debating points of etiquette and precedence, King George will be down on them, and find an easy prey in this disunited people.

RESULT OF THE PRIESTLY MANŒUVRES.

This explanation will make the sequel clear. The priests stated that they had sent for the man-of-war to come and assist the chiefs in the event of the King of Tonga invading Samoa, as he had threatened. The priests appealed to Heaven that they had no other design in view in sending for the ship of war. They urged them to put themselves under the protection of France. The chiefs were too wide-awake for the priests; they saw the dodge. They know as well as you the whole story of poor Tahiti, and they seem to be taking warning. What was the reply to the kind offer? Short and decisive—"No; we want no assistance from you. If the Tongans come, we can fight them ourselves."

But the kind, affectionate priests were not to be put off thus. They took the chiefs on this tack: they proposed to the chiefs to hoist the French flag on the same pole with the Samoan flag. Then if the Tongans injured their flag, the French would help them to fight the Tongans.

But even this offer was rejected; aye, and in a way they least expected. They evidently overdid the thing, and so, as it turned out, outdid themselves. Mana, their great champion, was compelled to open his eyes to the craft of those "wolves in sheep's clothing"—aye, and his mouth too—to expose it. That he did in true Samoan style. He said: "There was once a hungry fowl, and it saw some scraped cocoanut. It ran up to it, but when making to get at it, it saw a noose, and was scared away. So it is with Samoa. The moa, or fowl, is Samoa. The penu, or cocoanut, is the Word of God, for which Samoa is hungering. The matalese, or noose, is held by France, England, and America. Samoa is seeking after the Word of God, and while she is doing that, France is attempting to put the noose round her neck." As soon as the captain of the ship of war was told what had been said, he rose and left the meeting, not in the happiest mood. The priests were mad with indignation and disappointment. So the meeting was abruptly terminated.

POSSIBLE FATE AWAITING SAMOA: PRAYER REQUESTED.

There is a rumour current here just now to the effect that a second French ship-of-war, a three-decker, is on her way to Samoa, with 1,200 soldiers on board. Barracks are to be erected near Apia, and they are to be stationed here. Of course this may be a mere fable—very probably is. One thing is certain, I think, that the priests are doing their utmost to make Samoa a second Tahiti. Taking advantage of the present critical juncture, they no doubt thought it was a favourable time to offer the chiefs the sheltering wing of France. I cannot help thinking there is something in the wind. Some foul play is intended by France. I hope she will be narrowly watched, and that this magnificent group of islands will not be allowed quietly to fall into her cruel hands.

May God preserve Samoa from Tahiti's curse, and traitorous, lying priests!

Hoping this very hasty epistle may enlist the sympathies and prayers of your readers, I remain, &c.

Monthly Retrospect.

HOME.

ON the 9th of November the Prince of Wales attained his majority. The event would, no doubt, have been hailed with manifestations of a loyal devotion all over the kingdom, but for the stroke which lately befell our Court, and from the gloom of which it has not yet emerged. Still, there was not a pulpit on that Sabbath-day from which did not rise fervent and hearty prayers for the blessing of Almighty God to rest upon the young man, and to endue him with a portion of his father's spirit—not a town, on the following day, in which some allusion, more or less marked, was not made to the happy event. The Prince himself spent his birthday on the foreign shores of Naples, but in the company of his sister and brother-in-law; and some delay may yet take place before he arrives at home. Some time must still be allowed for seclusion, but the mourning for the dead will close with the closing year. The Royal wedding will speedily follow, and then we may expect the Prince to take his place by his mother's side, and be to her, as far as his youth and inexperience will allow, all that her husband was. From what is known of the young Prince, the best auguries are formed of his future career; and we can only hope that the same high-minded care for those things that make a nation's life, which glowed in his father's breast, will equally distinguish him; and, above all, that he may, like Solomon, "know the Lord God of his father."

The Week of Special Prayer at the New Year has now been continued for several years past; and we believe there is no Church or individual who has taken part in any of these services that would not consider their discontinuance as a great spiritual calamity. A circular has just been issued by the Evangelical Alliance, affectionately inviting Christians throughout the world to agree together as touching certain petitions that they shall ask during the first week of next New Year, from the 4th to the 11th of next January. The circular has already appeared in these pages, and we need only, therefore, remark here, that the state of the world never presented so many or such pressing incitements to prayer; while the experience of the blessings which have been showered down in answer to the prayers of former years presents a perennial spring of encouragement to persevere.

We noticed last month that Bishop Thomson, who had scarcely taken his position in the united see of Gloucester and Bristol, had been appointed Archbishop of York. The transfer has not yet been actually made; but it is understood that when it does, the Very Rev. Dr. Ellicott, Dean of Exeter, will be named as his successor. It is also announced that the Ven. Archdeacon Law, of Bath and Wells, has been appointed Dean of Gloucester. These appointments, we believe, fill up all the Church dignities now vacant. All of them will, we are sure, commend themselves to the approbation of Evangelical men. It is worth notice, however, that that special form of Evangelical doctrine exemplified in such men as Bishop Villiers, Bickersteth, Baring, and others, which once found exclusive favour in the Premier's eyes, has now given way to a broader, and, let us say, a more generous type, in the appointment of men whose piety is not less conspicuous, while their scholarship and ability are more widely recognised.

The distress in Lancashire continues to increase. It is ascertained that there are now 400,000 people in the manufacturing districts that are sustained entirely by means of charity. There is some complaint about the conduct of the wealthy residents in these districts themselves, on which it is not our province to decide; it is more to the purpose to observe that this suspicion of niggardliness in the districts has not chilled the liberality of those outside. From all parts a ceaseless flow of contributions sets steadily in; and we believe it to be certain that, large as is the need, the contributions meet it. Of course, there is still much misery—deep distress; but if the present rate of contributions be sustained, there is no fear of any one dying of starvation. And at present there seems little reason to dread a cessation of charity. There is hardly a church or chapel in the kingdom which has not, after making one collection more or less liberal, organised itself into a body for collecting weekly subscriptions, to be continued at least till the end of March. We scarcely know, indeed, whether more to admire, the Christian liberality which has been poured forth in such a brimming tide to the relief of our distressed brethren, or the manly, docile, and truly Christian patience of the sufferers themselves.

The work of Bishop Colenso continues to create much discussion. It is not that the blow is felt as damaging to the Bible; for there is little in it that has not been urged and answered again and again; and the book is indeed more a going back to the old phases of the infidel controversy which were popular in the days of Paine and Gibbon than to those more subtle objections with which modern refinement has made us familiar. The difficulty lies in knowing how to deal with a bishop who insists that he is feeding the flock, when all but himself feel that he is giving them deadly poison. He will not resign his charge, and there appears to be no law to compel him. The Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts have taken up the case, as they have some claim to do; for they were connected with his appointment; but as no part of his salary is derived from their funds, it does not appear how their opinion can affect him now. The indefatigable Archdeacon Denison, himself narrowly escaping the charge of heresy, has given notice of his intention to move for an inquiry into his case at the next meeting of Convocation; a motion which, we doubt not, will be agreed to, though we do not expect that much will follow from the investigation. We may add here that the argument before Dr. Lushington, on the amended articles preferred against the "Essays and Reviews," has been postponed till the 15th of this month.

Connected with the case of Bishop Colenso, the movements of the Rev. F. D. Maurice were the subject of much conversation in the early part of the month. It was known that they were intimate friends, and that, in token of personal affection, the Bishop had dedicated one of his volumes to his teacher. It was supposed that in his volume on the Pentateuch the enthusiastic scholar was only more clearly developing the more recondite views of the master; and this suspicion was increased when it was reported that Mr. Maurice had announced his intention to resign his living in the Church. It soon appeared, however, that this was wholly a misunderstanding. Mr. Maurice was grieved at the erratic course taken by the Bishop, and set himself to the task of answering him. To render his motives, as he thought, free from suspicion, he resolved to resign his living and fight the battle of the Church as a volunteer. But he soon found that his resignation would give rise to more misconstruction than his remaining; and though he perseveres in his intention to reply to the book, he has given up the idea of leaving the Church.

FOREIGN.

To the Christian philosopher there are few studies more interesting than the present state of the kingdom of Italy. After a long delay, the Emperor of the French has at last put an end to the suspense in which he left Europe, and has announced, through his Minister, that his mind is made up—he will not abandon the Pope, nor withdraw his army from Rome. For the political future of Italy this appears to be a heavy blow. It is not only that the new state is deprived of its homogeneity, and of its natural capital, to whose claims all the other cities would give way, but there is real danger and a standing menace in a large body of foreign troops being thus thrust forward, like a wedge, into the heart of the kingdom, overawing the deliberations of her statesmen, and cramping the growth of her national life. But this darkening of the political prospects of Italy is accompanied with strange brightenings on her ecclesiastical horizon. In the long agony of suspense in which they have been left the Italians have learnt, and they are likely to learn more rapidly and more thoroughly now than ever, that the one cause of their miseries is the system of the Papacy—that a Pope with temporal power and a free Italy are incompatible. Sincerely devout Roman Catholics might, perhaps, say that, if this were so, the political advantage ought to be sacrificed to the religious, and therefore the higher one. Roman Catholics do reason thus, but only outside of Italy. There, where the full galling of the chain is felt, the reverence for the Pope loses its hold as rapidly as the English dogma of passive obedience lost its hold on its supporters as soon as James II. began to put it to the trial. One of the most significant signs of the fermentation at work in Italian society is the petition drawn up by Father Passaglia, and signed by 10,000 ecclesiastics, calling upon the Pope to give peace to his native country, by resigning his temporal power. No objection, that we know of, has been made to the character or position of the priests who have signed this important paper. Father Passaglia stood so high in Papal estimation, that only a few years ago he was selected to defend the dogma of the “Immaculate Conception.” So far as we know, he still retains his belief in that unscriptural absurdity. In fact, none of these men, in signing the petition, consider that they cease to be good Catholics; they would be shocked to be told that they were on the high road to that heresy which they count Protestantism to be. But it does not matter through what oblique light finds an entrance; we know that, once admitted, it finds its way into every corner. Had the Pope joined the national movement, the Italians would have been more determined Papists than the Irish. But Pope Pius has thought fit to place himself in opposition to the national will, and now we find all Italy warmly and freely discussing what are the rights and what the encroachments of the Pope. For a lively picture of the ferment now working through all parts of this beautiful country, we have great pleasure in referring to the letter of our Italian correspondent.

Our French correspondent properly calls attention to the extraordinary circumstance that the atheist, Proudhon, has come forward as a champion of the temporal power of the Pope, and that his advocacy has been hailed by the Jesuit journals as a powerful aid to their cause. If the help of those whose teachings they hate is of any value to them, they have been singularly favoured with it; for not only has M. Proudhon come to the rescue of the Pope, but he is joined by Guizot, the Protestant, and Drouyn de Lhuys, who, if his friends belie him not, holds the Pagan notion of a transmigration of souls. But whatever their value, for the present this motley band appear to have might upon their side, and the Pope has received a new lease of the Roman capital. Is he, or are his friends content, then? By no means. As our correspondent remarks, not one word of gratitude or acknowledgment has escaped from Papal lips. On the contrary, they keep up their demands for what is still withheld from them, and insist on the restoration of the Marches and Umbria, which are now irrevocably absorbed in the kingdom of Italy. In France, too, the Papal victory is celebrated by a fresh outburst of priestly and petty municipal intolerance. We regret to add that, among the Protestants, the progress of neological doctrines is becoming every day more manifest. We are not sorry for the severance which this often appears to involve, though we grieve to find that the followers of religious error are so numerous; and our only consolation must be in those religious agencies which our correspondent describes as at work among the rising generation, and which are much more numerous on the orthodox than the heretical side.

The insurrection in Greece proceeds quietly. Strictly speaking, indeed, now that the King and his counsellors have disappeared, there is no insurrection at all. Affairs go on under the Provisional Government with as much calmness and regularity as if it had been accustomed to govern for centuries, instead of being placed amidst the confusion of a recently-overturned throne. But with all this order there is also much excitement. Not only the inhabitants of the kingdom, but men of Greek race, wherever they may be scattered, look upon this as a crisis in the future of their nation; and the Provisional Government encourages the feeling by inviting Greeks, in all parts of the world, to meet together and send representatives to the congress that is about to be held for the election of the new King. Even politicians who are not Greeks see, in the wonderful events now going forward, a solution of the Eastern difficulty, and talk of raising up a free, powerful, independent Greek nation, composed of all the territories inhabited by Greeks now in the hands of Turkey, as well as the Ionian Islands, as a barrier to the encroachments of Russia. In such an arrangement, European Turkey would, of course, be crushed. So far as secular matters are concerned, the arrangement might not be a bad one; but with our experience of the fanatical disposition of the leading Greek ecclesiastics, we are disposed to doubt whether the Evangelical Protestant preacher does not now enjoy more toleration under the infidel Osmanli than he would under the Christian domination of a Greek empire, with its complete organization of patriarch, monk, archimandrite, and pope. The strangest part of the story, however, remains to be told. Not only is the rumour revived of the anxiety of the Greeks to elect Prince Alfred, the second son of our Queen, to the vacant throne; but the French papers assert that Earl Russell has addressed a circular to the Foreign Powers, intimating that, though the English Government would do nothing to promote his election, yet, if he were to become the spontaneous choice of the Greeks, they would not counsel him to decline. If this should really be the case, and Prince Alfred were to mount an Oriental throne, bringing English ideas, civilisation, and religion in his train, what a singular vista down futurity would it offer! But we doubt it is altogether baseless. Prince Alfred is the heir to the Duchy of Coburg, a dominion not much smaller, and infinitely quieter, than that of Greece; and for the future, there is all the fermentation now existing in Germany, seeking for amalgamation under a wise and liberal ruler, to count for something in the eventualities of the young Prince's destiny. We do not believe he will abandon Gotha for Athens.

The unhappy quarrel between the King of Prussia and his Chamber shows no sign of healing. Prosecutions are taking place in various parts of the country against those journals which espouse the popular cause; and to the various deputations which wait upon the Sovereign but one answer is returned—that he is resolved to maintain his prerogative. Of course a quarrel between the secular powers, on a question so grave, cannot but prove injurious to the religious interests of the country; but we are indebted to our Frankfort correspondent for an explanation how directly the mischief works. The reactionary party which now supports the King in the attitude of resistance he has unhappily taken up, profess to be actuated by high religious principles. The natural effect of this is, that religion is regarded as the political enemy of the political liberties of Germany. It may appear strange that a better understanding of the relations between the secular and the spiritual powers should not be held in a Protestant country like Prussia; but, unfortunately, German Protestantism altogether is in an unsatisfactory condition. Its Rationalism has been long known, and the reaction has been rather towards the verge of Popery than a simple understanding of the truth as it is in Jesus. A singular and sad instance of its working in this direction, is to be found in a letter we publish from an old correspondent, where, in the enlightened little kingdom of Hanover, the Lutheran and Roman Catholic bodies appear to have united together to compel the sale to the latter of a church which the Reformed Church has possessed for two centuries and a-half. It seems that the Reformed party, not being numerous in Hanover, have no consistory to represent their interests, but are obliged to trust themselves to the guardianship of the Lutherans; and what the value of that guardianship amounts to we see in the above pregnant instance. Happily, the little body stand firm, and, through the aid of others, we trust they will be able to disappoint those who covet their property.

A letter from Denmark at the present time is particularly welcome, in prospect of that auspicious union between the Royal houses which we trust will draw closer the religious as well as the political bonds between the two countries. It will be seen from our correspondent's letter that the Danish Church is still actively employed in mission work, chiefly among the natives of Greenland, among whom our readers well know the Gospel was planted several years ago, though much has to be done for them in the way of instruction and enlightenment. We are rather surprised that Greenland has not yet received a native pastorate, and still more that it is even now regarded as a matter of doubtful expediency, from the fear that the Greenland Christians will hardly yield the requisite authority to pastors of their own race. But the most amusing part of the proceeding to an Englishman is, that in this conflict of opinion the Missionary Society has memorialised the Danish Government to send out competent persons to Greenland to examine into the state of the native Churches, and to report on their fitness for a native pastorate; and it seems the Government is about to comply with the request.

A communication from the Navigators' Islands brings us important information. The French appear to be trying to obtain possession of these islands, as they have already done over Tahiti and its dependencies. A war is threatened, it seems, between Samoa and Tonga; and a French man-of-war came to anchor in the bay, while the chiefs, instigated by the French priests settled on the island, debated the question whether they would put themselves under French protection. The answer, however, was a decided negative; they would defend themselves; they did not want French help. A more subtle request was preferred, for liberty to hoist the French flag on the island. But this excited the indignation even of the native adherents of France, and the intrigues of the priests were completely foiled. But if France have really set her eye on the island, we fear she will find an excuse.

We have been so long accustomed to hear charges of jealousy, envy, ill-will, and hatred, bandied across the Atlantic by sections of both the English and American press, that the report furnished to us by our American correspondent, of the annual meeting of the American Board of Missions, held at Springfield, Massachusetts, has all the effect on the mind of "cold waters to a thirsty soul." Here the din of war appears to have been hushed; the old fraternal feeling between the Christians of both countries reappears; and all other interests dwindle in the intense light of the grand spectacle of Christ's kingdom set up amongst men. We wish we could hold out a hope that this momentary gleam of a blessed vision were likely to be rendered permanent by the termination of the war. The Emperor of the French made proposals both to England and to Russia to join in recommending an armistice to the two contending sections; but both Powers declined the delicate negotiation, on the plea that the time for intervention did not appear to them to be come. In the North, great events have happened. The annual elections in the different states have just taken place, and have ended in a decisive victory nearly all over the North for the Democratic, or as they may here be called, the friends of the South party. This is the most decisive indication that has yet happened that the people are tired, if not of the war, at least of the mode of carrying it on. Immediately following on this the President took the unexpected step of removing General M'Clellan from the command of the army. The charge against him is that he did not follow the enemy with sufficient activity; but as M'Clellan was of the party of those who have recently been so successful at the elections, it is suspected that political rather than military reasons have influenced the President in his decision. In the midst of this storm-whirl of passion, it is hard for the mind to repose on any fact that holds out any distinct promise of an approaching termination of hostilities.
